Mexican Transfer Chem-Eng Student Relies On Dictionary

By M. J. WINTER '44

With an English-Spanish dictionary under her arm, Elsa Perez-Castaneda strolls to classes and has little difficulty understanding her professors.

The Mexican coed, a senior in chemical engineering, studied English before coming to Penn State, but is afraid persons here have more trouble trying to understand her than she has in learning from them.

Having received four year's training at Monterrey, Mexico, Elsa will complete her studies here on a Pennsylvania Federation of Women's Clubs' scholarship for Latin American women. A Mexican student must take an additional year at a university to receive a degree after a preliminary four years.

According to Elsa, many Mexican coeds study engineering, medicine, law, chemistry, and physics, so she finds Penn State a little different.

Dormitory food here is unlike Mexican dishes, according to the new student. Young goats and various fruits are served in the country.

"The meat at home is prepared differently, and we always had our large meal at noon," she said. "I am getting used to your system, however."

Dressed in typically American clothes, Elsa said that Mexican costumes with vivid colors and spangled embroidery are worn only on holidays and festivals. When interviewed, she wore huraches, a style borrowed from her country. Hers were of more intricate design, decorated with colored figures.

Unlike the American idea of a Mexican woman, the coed does little Mexican dancing.

"I used to do those dances," she said, "but I have no time now."

Elsa arrived at the College a week ago after a seven-day trip by train. She hopes to return to Mexico and work for a petroleum company after a year here.
