merely given expression to the will of the American people dur-Draft Bill hadn't been met with ing the years since the repression,

"A nation should not be althe Republican antipathy to both lowed to preserve one policy for itself and another in the treatment of its neighbors," Dr. Hutchinson said. "The four freedoms are an extension of our own New Deal, and the peoples of the world still want the balance of power in favor of the common man."

> Dr. Hutchinson discussed the qualifications of the various Republican candidates for the 1944 presidency: Dewey, MacArthur, Stassen, and Bricker. He pointed out that Governor Stassen's fine record as governor of Minnesota would make him the most favorable candidate. The only drawback was his lack of experience which might make him a prisoner of the Republican party, if he did make office.

> It was generally agreed by the participants of the forum that the Republicans had lost a promising candidate in Mr. Willkie, whose political prestige has increased tremendously since he has stopped campaigning. "He was the only candidate openly committed to a strong foreign policy, and since we are definitely enmeshed in the international scene we must have a party dedicated to internationalism," Dr. Hutchinson

> In the open discussion that followed, many questions were raised concerning the coming presidential campaign. It was pointed out, by a faculty member, that it might be unwise to stress the importance of political issues, since polls have shown that voting is based more on traditional voting behavior than upon any new issues which may make an appearance. Dr. Lipke of the political science department suggested that personalities rather than issues are usually stressed. "The party asks not "what can win," but rather "who can win?" he said:

> He added that our own instinct for self-survival makes the American people determined to obtain a lasting peace this time, and that they are watching for the party that can present a platform satisfying these demands.
