

Movie Revived By Film Club

The International Film Club resumes its program of outstanding movies with the showing of "The Lower Depths" in 121 Sparks at 7 and 9 p.m. on Monday.

For several years Professors Abramson and Watson of the Sociology department had conceived of a group devoted to seeing movies of other lands and comparing their quality with our Hollywood productions. Not until hundreds had donated their services and money last semester did the project finally succeed.

Each film was selected for its educational value. Russian, American, and French movie-producing companies were represented by "Chepayev," "Citizen Kane," and "Grande Illusion." Members contributed $1.00 and were privileged to front row seats. Admission to all other students was free.

"The Lower Depths," based on Gorky's famous play, was directed by Jean Renoir and the cast includes Jean Gabin, Louis Jonvet and others.

As last semester, admission is free, with reserved seats for members.

Three Penn Staters Meet Under Fire At Beachhead

Reunions have been dropped for the duration at the College, but three Penn Staters still found time to swap stories when the fortunes of war inexplicably joined them in No Man's Land at Anzio.

The three, all Pennsylvanians, were serving on the Anzio beachhead when volunteers were sought for a nighttime reconnaissance. The six who finally were chosen crept into the black night from different directions, and planned to meet at a prearranged rendezvous.

Lt. Alan G. McIntyre of 4604 Woodland Ave., Drexel Hill, who had joined the patrol upon his own insistence, was the first to reach his goal. While he lay on his stomach, peering into the darkness, another member of the party pulled himself alongside of McIntyre.

"Are you Lieutenant McIntyre?" the newcomer asked.

When McIntyre responded in the affirmative, the newcomer identified himself as Frank Stevenson Jr., of 32 West Court Blvd., West Lawn, near Reading.

"I heard you were here," Stevenson, a member of the Ranger platoon at Anzio, said, "but I never had the time to look you up."

"There's another Penn State boy with me tonight," Stevenson added as he looked about him, "and he should be along any minute."

Soon George L. Stolte of 1112 Fillmore St., Philadelphia, joined his buddies in No Man's Land and they crawled to a nearby foxhole for a brief but spirited "bull session."

One of the first persons McIntyre related the story to when he returned to headquarters was Lt. Elmer E. Davies of 213 East Patterson St., Lansford, an officer in the same battalion and an alumnus also of Penn State.

41 Ham-Prop Students Complete College Course

Forty-one Hamilton-Propeller students have completed a six-month course in engineering aide and are embarking upon another six-month course of specific assignments, according to Miss Ruth Chamberlain, personnel manager.

The girls, the last group of students of the kind on campus, will study drafting and design, aerodynamics, chemistry and metallurgy, and advanced engineering aide until graduation in December.

Alumnus Commands Unit Of Japanese-Americans

Of the 8500 alumni of the College scattered throughout the world in various positions of military service, one of the most unusual assignments is held by Lt. Charles Fairlamb of Stoneboro.

Lt. Fairlamb commands a unit of the 442nd Combat Team, a military group comprised entirely of enlisted men of Japanese descent.

News of his position was received by Dr. C. S. Anderson, professor of agricultural education at the College and a former teacher of Lt. Fairlamb.

'Don't Gripe About Health Service,' Says Dr. Ritenour

"Students who complain of the present day College Health Service should have been here in 1917 when I first came to work in the College," said Dr. J. P. Ritenour, head of the College Health Service, in a recent interview.

"At that time," continued Dr. Ritenour, "the College Dispensary and Infirmary were located next to the tri-dorms in what is now Bennett House, a student home economics practice house. "All Dispensary calls were handled on the first floor; the second floor had room for six bed patients; and a married couple who assisted with the patients lived on the third floor," stated Dr. Ritenour.

Dr. Ritenour also told the reporter of other poor existing conditions. He said that at Bennett House, the College only employed one full time nurse and one part time nurse. According to Dr. Ritenour these women nursed the patients day and night, cooked their own meals, and all those of their patients, and tended the furnace. One bathroom for all patients, nurses, the caretakers, and the physician, no facilities for heating water were some other poor features of the old hospital which Dr. Ritenour revealed.

In addition to the regular hospital, the College maintained a shack for contagious diseases. This was located on the site where the water tower now stands. To the "Pest House" as this branch of the hospital was commonly called were brought all cases of measles, mumps, chicken pox, and scarlet fever.

Dr. Ritenour stated that Bennett House was later remodeled, a bath was added on the third floor, the heating system was connected to the college power plant, the staff was gradually increased, and a cook was hired.

On January 4, 1929 the present infirmary, located opposite Grange Dormitory was opened for use. This building regularly holds 30 beds but has room for 50. Up until 1938 when Old Main was rebuilt, the Dispensary was located in the basement of the infirmary building. Working in the hospital and the dispensary were eight nurses, a superintendent, one doctor and one clerk. Now the College employs five physicians, ten nurses, (two at the dispensary), one superintendent of nurses, one laboratory technician, one x-ray technician, two cooks, a housekeeper, a helper, and four clerks, (three at the Dispensary, and one at the Hospital.)

In going over his records Dr. Ritenour discovered that at present a much larger percentage of the College enrollment come to the Dispensary and Infirmary for treatment. Tug-o'-wars, old-fashioned fist fights and epidemics of scarlet fever, measles, and influenza, were once the causes of a great number of hospital cases. Now upper respiratory diseases and minor accidents bring many cases in for treatment.

Dr. J. P. Ritenour came to the College in the summer of 1917 after Warren E. Forsythe, former college physician, left for work with the Rockefeller center. At present Dr. Forsythe is head of the Health Service at the University of Michigan.

Braun To Address Sunday Chapel

"Beyond Expectancy" will be the subject discussed in college chapel Sunday by Rev. David Braun, pastor of the Swarthmore Presbyterian Church, Swarthmore, Pa.

Rev. Braun is a trustee in the Elwyn Training School and a director of the Westminster Foundation of the University of Pennsylvania and the Chester Hospital. He served one year as Director of Religious Activities at Lehigh University and in 1942 was in the service at Newport News, Virginia, as part of the Presbyterian Wartime Service Commission.

Rev. Braun was graduated from York College, Nebraska in 1927 and received his bachelor of divinity at Yale in 1930.

The dry cleaners aren't getting in on the gravy nowadays. Too busy to bother with ties.
