Proposes Plan For Servicemen

College academic degrees should be awarded to servicemen on the basis of attainment rather than time requirements, advocated Dr. Charles C. Peters, director of educational research at the College, today.

Any student should be awarded a degree as soon as he has successfully passed a series of comprehensive examinations, recommends the professor of education, whether the student has been attending college for two months or two years.

"College," he said, "must devise a practical way to treat servicemen. Educators must realize that the boys who come back will have knocked about all over the world, will possess a new maturity, and will know what they want."

Under this plan, Dr. Peters explained, students would be given an opportunity to utilize general and specific education which they have received while in service.

The old system, involving credit and time-in-residence requirements, should be retained, he said, for the students who prefer it. However, he predicted many veterans will balk at the old mechanical routine and insist upon education as fast as they can.
