Pan-American Prize Winner Selects State For Schooling

"The mountainous landscape here is marvelous, just like my home." With this in mind, Martha Bascope Vargas, Bolivian winner of a Pan-American scholarship, selected Penn State when she was offered a choice of all the colleges in the United States.

In 1942 Martha wrote an essay on "What Inter-American Cooperation Means to My Country," for an inter-American student forum contest. As grand-prize winner of this contest, Martha came to Washington, D. C., and eventually to Penn State to study chemistry. While in Washington Martha came to the College on a visit, and as she exclaims, she was so impressed with the beauty of the campus that she decided to enroll here this semester.

The Bolivian coed modestly considers herself "very lucky" in winning the scholarship. Although she enjoys her classes, she misses the high altitude of her own country, and "especially my mother." "My English isn't very fine," she apologizes, but she often talks in her native language with Lilia Sanguero, a Bolivian graduate student here.

Although she is primarily interested in chemistry, Martha hopes to minor in journalism, which is a pioneer field for women in her country. While still in high school in Bolivia, she wrote for the school paper, and translated English and German articles.

Trying her tongue at American slang, the South American coed says, "Not all students have the opportunity to study in America, but I think it's swell."

One of the first highlights in Martha's trip to this country was her four-day ride from Bolivia by Pan-American plane, which afforded her first glimpse of the sea. "You know," Martha pointed out, "my country is surrounded by land, and although we have beautiful Lake Titicaca, we are nowhere near the sea. Flying over the ocean was very thrilling."

Official confirmation followed with a wire from the War Department declaring that "Lt. Lehman has been repatriated and is being returned to United States to arrive in New York aboard the Gripsholm in the near future."

The wire continued that arrangements had been made for Lt. Lehman to be taken to Halloran General Hospital, Staten Island, immediately after his arrival in New York. Friends may write, telegraph, or telephone Lt. Ross B. Lehman, c/o Commanding General, Halloran General Hospital, Staten Island, New York.
