

A V-12 Day-

nees fell out for the most popular part of the days routine—mail call. Each sailor upon receiving his mail sat quietly reading letters and hometown newspapers.

At lunch I stuffed myself with a meal of roast beef, potatoes, gravy, asparagus, tomatoes, pudding, bread and butter, and milk, easily superior to the food in the restaurants downtown. At this time A/S Ed Perkovic, whose birthday it was, was presented with a cup cake with one candle on it.

Before drill in the Army A/S Jack Palme told me why he is the handsomest man in Barracks 13. Then we marched in close order formation to the commands of the house leaders in preparation for the regular Saturday review. At 2 o'clock the drill ended and the trainees set out for the afternoon of classes.

My schedule included a swimming class where water safety and survival in the water was stressed. After a few minutes of fetching blocks under water, carrying a dummy rifle, and climbing rope cargo nets I began to feel slightly waterlogged.

Back at the barracks I lined up to march to my last meal in the Navy. Fortified by the advice of the man behind me, "Don't ever let anyone rush you through a chow line. You may miss something," I devasted large portions of beef stew, peas, beets, chocolate cake, ice cream, rolls and milk.

Then, my 24 hour hitch completed, I said so long to a few

State College Workshop Sponsors Chinese Speaker

fellows, certain of some things that I had not known before. The men of the V-12 are not just school boys in blues. They are Navy men preparing to do an important job. They will do it well, too.

After I had removed the uniform and dressed in civilian clothes, I saw the unit marching in order back to the barracks. I felt a bit proud and a bit sad as they went by. You see, I was in the Navy once—if only for a day.
