

Tanger Views Truman Plans

A College government expert today visualized the first years of the Truman administration as a period of stabilization and consolidation of Roosevelt-instigated policies.

The remaining war years will bring innovations of only minor significance in the federal government set-up, national and international policies, according to Dr. Jacob Tanger, head of the political science department.

"The real test of Truman as a leader will come," he said, "when the military phases of the war cease and it becomes necessary to implement the peace program at home and abroad."

While Dr. Tanger believes the new president will adhere closely to the plans of his predecessor, he pointed out that Truman will be less inclined toward wide peacetime expenditure of public funds and also better qualified to work with Congress because of his senatorial experience.

Describing Truman as a "plain, good man, happily possessed of considerable political experience," the Penn State professor expressed the belief the new leader will not attempt to settle all problems himself but will seek advice from "the best brains in the country."

Sigma Xi To Hear Talk On Penicillin

Robert W. Stone, associate professor of bacteriology at the College, will speak on "Penicillin" at the final Sigma Xi lecture of the year, which will follow the honorary's annual banquet at the State College Hotel at 6:30 p. m. Wednesday. The lecture will be in 119 New Physics Building at 8 p. m.

Stone's talk will relate how penicillin production rose from less than one per cent of the nation's needs in the fall of 1943 to its present overwhelming total. He will particularly discuss the WPB research project at Penn State, which was organized to help industry recover penicillin from the broth in which the mold is grown.

"In an attempt to help in this recovery," Stone says, "a chemically known medium was developed that not only gave penicillin of a higher purity but offers hope of making several different penicillins. This type of 'microbial engineering' has many possibilities for future development."

Tickets for the dinner may be bought from E. E. Ambrosius, T. S. Polansky, I. M. Sheffer, H. D. Zook, and C. B. Link.

Chase Stresses Necessity For Complete Employment

"Never forget that the United States is physically all right, and that whatever is physically possible is financially possible," emphasized Stuart Chase, noted economist and writer, in his ec-

"Think of the new skills given to the servicemen during this war. In 1944 we produced substantially enough in 1939, and we also produced many different types of commodities."

Full employment is not just a job, Mr. Chase stated, but it is a feeling that one belongs. He pointed out the fact that Hitler came to power when one man out of three was unemployed in Germany.

"In my opinion, full employment is more important than Dumbarton Oaks," the lecturer commented. "Fifty seven million jobs are needed for full employment," he continued, "and it is dangerous to believe that business can automatically employ such a number."

"What can we do to insure jobs for everyone?" Mr. Chase asked.

There are four systems by which that question can be answered, he pointed out, the first being complete rationing of economy; second, socializing economy; third, using a compensatory system; fourth, effecting a free competitive economy.

"The compensatory system seems best for the United States," he explained. "It allows both for profit and service incentives. If we cannot have both of these, we are victims of too much logic."

STUART CHASE

ture on "Jobs after the War," presented Tuesday night. "We have the manpower to provide necessities," he continued.
