

Three Speakers Discuss Farm Problems of Veterans

Problems of the veteran returning to the farm were discussed at the College recently by three authorities on vocational training. The speakers, Dr. J. C. Wright of the U. S. Office of Education, Dr. A. K. Getman, supervisor of vocational agriculture education in New York State, and Major Ralph C. Wenrich, one-time Pennsylvania vocational educator, described their work and plans to the students in agricultural education.

In reference to vocational education Dr. Wright said, "Public schools are finding they must be prepared to offer the type of education that is required by the people."

According to Dr. Wright, the results of a survey of 117 businesses show that college trained men are performing duties that an untrained man could handle in 40 per cent of the jobs. These jobs could be done just as efficiently by vocationally trained men. Thus we have a need for more and better vocational training.

The speaker said, "We cannot see what lies ahead; but in planning for the future we must consider the armed forces, women in industry, and the youth who have left the farm. We do not want them to return to a period of unemployment."

Dr. Getman speaking of the plans pending in New York State told of the long range agricultural training program. Returning veterans can receive aid, advice, and instruction for as many as 20 years. Those interested in agriculture as a career, and there are more than 100,000 such men in New York State according to estimates, can start their training under the institute plan. This is a system of junior colleges which give post-high school agricultural training. Expenses at these institutions will be paid by the Veterans Administration.

"Plans for training veterans embrace the whole field of agriculture from production to merchandising, and educational requirements will be waived for the soldiers who want to participate," said Dr. Getman.

Major Wenrich, graduate of the College and director of training at Camp Carson, Colo., gave a picture of the reconditioning wounded soldiers receive. This involves both mental and emotional training as well as physical restoration.

Illustrating his points with slides of patients at work, Major Wenrich described how a new convalescent is examined and interviewed to determine what sort of training would be best. Patients may at their own request be transferred to another type of training if they feel they are not fitting in well where they are.

To restore a disabled soldier to his former functional capacity

there are swimming pools, bowling alleys, remedial gymnasiums, riding horses, bicycles—all kinds of equipment and all regulated by expert instructors. Shops and classrooms cover 30,000 square feet.

In conclusion Major Wenrich pointed out that, "The objective of the reconditioning program is not trade training, but to help the men recover a confidence in themselves."

'No Saturday Classes' Proves False Alarm

When a notice on an Ath Hall bulletin board caught the eye of a passing coed she shrieked with delight. She was soon surrounded by all the girls within earshot, and each exclaimed at the extraordinary news.

The notice on the bulletin board gave a few facts but the one that stood the most was the phrase "no Saturday classes."

The news was spread about the dorm and all those who suffer from Saturday-morning-lack-of-sleep were thrilled. But the real meaning of the phrase had to be discovered. Almost in tears the girls looked again when an observant coed pointed out that above the words "no Saturday classes" it said, "Until further notice the Riding Club class hours have been changed."

Recorder Fulfills A Tailor's Prayer

Lose a button? The man most likely to match that lost button is Alexander W. Stewart, chief recorder in the Registrar's office. Stewart has three to four thousand buttons at his farm near Bellefonte.

In accounting for the large variety, the collector said, "Many people who know of my hobby have given me a number of unusual buttons." Buttons of every conceivable size, shape, color, and design can be found in the recorder's accumulation.

Stewart has tied most of the collection to strips of linen and is able to say that there are no duplicates. He also has eight to ten hundred unused paper matches that bear trade names from all over the country.
