Campus Rural Groups Foresee Penn State Leading Movement

cially, and spiritually?" "How can I contribute the most to my community?" These and many more equally baffling questions were asked by students attending a discussion of problems facing the rural youth of today, which was held in 401 Old Main on Feb-

Eugene Fulmer, first vice president of the Pennsylvania Rural Youth Association and editor of the Rural Youth of the United States of America, presided at the meeting attended by campus representatives of the Future Farmers of America, Ag Student Council, 4-H Club, and Block and Bridle Club. The FFA is already associated with the RYA, and the Rural Youth of the United States of America.
COOPERATION AS AIM

These two associations of rural youth groups have been formed to coordinate the efforts of all in solving problems that face each of them. As in urban areas, there is constant conflict between old ideas and progress. The RYA is attempting to bring progress to the runal areas, while keeping intact those old ideas of culture and life which have been tried and found good for a healthy and contented farm populace.

In this program, Penn State has the opportunity to take a leading role in attaining the desired objectives, Fulmer stated. He explained the action of the last RYA conference, whereby each county in Pennsylvania was limited to one officer in the organization. However, since Penn State does

PENN STATE A CENTER

Active participation by Penn State in the rural youth movement will do much in insuring its success, Fulmer emphasized. Penn State, by its central location and concentration of agriculture students, can train leaders for the movement, can help in coordinating the work of all rural youth groups in the state, and can act as a liaison officer in setting up publicity agents in each county, releasing activity news, and setting forth the aims of the movement through newspaper, magazine, and radio.
