College Makes Best Film On Traffic Safety in 1945

The best film on traffic safety produced in the United States in 1945 was made by the Motion Picture and Recording Studio of the College under the direction of Frank S. Neusbaum, professor of drama, who wrote the script and directed the picture.

"Teach Them To Drive" was sponsored by the American Legion with cooperation in production of the Automotive Safety Foundation. The film was released early in 1945 through the auspices of the Legion and submitted in the contest conducted annually by the National Committee of Films for Safety of the National Safety Foundation where it took first place.

This contest was open to any group that produced a film on safety, stated Amos E. Neyhart, head of the Institute of Public Safety. "Teach Them To Drive" competed against films made by companies all over the country.

"The film has been directly responsible for the installation of driver training programs in many high schools," Mr. Neyhart said. "It has unquestionably saved many lives."

All of the indoor sets and many of the outdoor scenes in the picture were filmed in State College with students and townspeople appearing as extras.

Assistant Mr. Neusbaum, director of the Motion Picture and Recording Studio in producing the 16 millimeter film were I. C. Boerlin, supervisor of Audio-Visual Aids who served as production supervisor; Paul H. Seitzinger, in charge of sound recording and film editing; and Luther F. Kepler, photographer. Mr. Neyhart, director of the Institute of Public Safety, served as technical advisor.

The cast included Raymond W. Tyson, assistant professor of public speaking, as the father; Mrs. Lucetta Kennedy, who had previous stage experience, as the mother. Herbert Koepf-Baker, professor of speech and speech education, played the high school superintendent. John H. Frizzell, head of the speech department, was the narrator. Jean Thurston and Robert Keller, both students, had the juvenile leads.

Over 200 prints of the 23-minute film have been released by the American Legion and they are now in circulation in every state.

Chinese Graduate Chemistry Student Begins Lab Work

Ching-Sin Miao has been in the United States for only 16 days, but already she has begun work in a laboratory in the chemical engineering building at the College. July 1 she will be officially enrolled as a graduate student in chemistry.

It all came about when Pauline B. Mack, professor of textile chemistry at the College, collaborated with the Agricultural Association of China in bringing Chinese students to the United States for further study in the field of chemistry.

A classmate of Ching-Sin's Tsung-Deh Shuan, will join her here as soon as transportation facilities are available.

The young Chinese woman, who intends to work for her B. S. and her Ph. D. at the College, wears the traditional dress of her country. Except for this she might be one of the few thousand coeds on campus, and Ching-Sin Miao would like to have it that way too. Not Penn State in China, but China in Penn State.

his position under the table at Eatlands last night, "Nittany-Independent got Stapleton in and we sure as goodness gracious can get one lousy turtle elected."

Horses Ineligible

To which Mike Horen loudly blew his own horn (that's a joke, son) in reply, saying, "We had a dark horse entered, until the blasted elections committee told us yesterday that this was a turtle race."

Strict honesty will be observed in the counting of the votes, all counting being done by Messrs. Green and Horen. To save time, elections committee reserves the right to quit counting any time they think their candidate has won. In case of a tie, the issue will be decided by flipping a student off the tower of Old Main and giving the election to the party scraping the most blood from the pavement.

In any event, Penn State will be represented. So get in there and vote . . . two or three times at least.
