

Tularemia

With the opening of the hunting season in a few days, the following statement from Dr. Herbert R. Glenn, director of the College medical service, is of timely import.

"You may get this disease (tularemia) from any small game animal or bird, but in the East, the vast majority of cases are contracted from rabbits. Most of the cases come from getting blood on the hands; the germ either penetrating the intact skin or passing through a small cut or sore. Accordingly, the safest way to dress a rabbit is to use rubber gloves.

If these are not available, do not dress a rabbit if you have a sore on the hand and even if no such sores are present, wash the hands immediately and thoroughly with lots of soap and water.

The disease may be contracted by eating incompletely cooked rabbit meat. Thorough cooking destroys the germ. Until this year there was no treatment for this disease, the patient either died or got well. This year streptomycin is available which will cure the disease if you are so careless and unfortunate to get it."

So Sorry

A letter from Gene Fulmer, junior class president, was incorrectly quoted in yesterday's Collegian. The paragraph should have read: "I should like to take this opportunity to thank each and every individual for helping Jacques Zivic, Charles "Chuck" Willing and myself stage a successful campaign."

Robert St. John

"Will there be a third World War?" is the question of the era. When Robert St. John, newspaper correspondent and author, spoke in Schwab Auditorium recently he held up his thumb and forefinger, about an inch apart from each other, and in a deep, dramatic voice warned a spellbound audience "We have about this much chance of averting a third World War!"

"You cannot fight a war to end all wars," he said "because each war begets another. But the third World War will end all wars. It will obliterate all civilization as we know it!"

Mr. St. John, who is the author of two books, "From the Land of Silent People" and "It's Always Tomorrow," travelled through 29 European countries for the Associated Press to gather his facts.

The result is his bitter denunciation of Byrnes' "get tough with Russia" policy, and his ardent, almost pleading, request that America try to understand Russia better.

"We write a lot of documents about freedom of speech, of religion, and of the press, yet we are not willing to let Russia keep the kind of government it wants," St. John said.

"Too often," he added, "freedom of the press is freedom for the owners of newspapers to publish what they want us to believe. THERE IS A VAST DIFFERENCE BETWEEN FREEDOM TO TELL THE TRUTH AND LICENSE TO DISTORT THE TRUTH."

Highlight of the speech was a short period when St. John asked his audience to pretend they were Russians. He traced briefly the maturation of a Russian citizen, and then carried the idea through with the Russian's arrival in New York City on his way to the San Francisco Conference.

"If we do not avoid a third World War," he said, "it will be because of 15 minutes at the San Francisco Conference when Stettinius got up on the floor and proposed the seating of Argentina at the Conference."

Molotov opposed, St. John added. "When the Russian asked for 48 hours to investigate and to try to determine whether the reports that Argentina was a hotbed of fascism were true, he was refused that permission. The Conference railroaded the legislation through, and Argentina was theoretically seated that very day.

"Every bad thing Russia ever did started that very day," St. John emphasized. Before that time, he said, General Eisenhower issued a report from Russia saying that cooperation was "perfect."

St. John, who arrived in France in September, 1939 just one day before the war broke out, further emphasized the reason why the United States wanted to seat Argentina at the San Francisco Conference.

This was one of the 19 great mistakes the United States made, St. John said, every one of which is worse than all of Russia's mistakes combined. Several of the other 19 mistakes the speaker mentioned are: 1) dropping two atomic bombs, 2) keeping the secret of the atom bomb from the United Nations, 3) United States and Britain's policies in Indonesia, Palestine, Greece, the Dutch East Indies, China, and some of the Pacific islands.

After Max Lerner spoke at State College in the Spring semester of 1945, a group of students got together and started the Common Sense Club. After St. John's speech, the newspaperman was made an honorary member of that organization. This is not enough.
