created and the stage movement were at all times pleasing to the eye.

But the pacing of the show was faulty. Within each act it was fine—but that of the entire show was a different story. By pacing the show slowly and striving for the "dramatic moment" too often in the first two acts, the show had little punch left in the last act, which is the time when it was needed.

Aside from an inability to control his facial expression, the glaring deficit in Martin Baum's performance (and, to a much lesser degree, in that of Miss Davis) was a lack of sensitivity. That is, Mr. Browning, as portrayed by Mr. Baum, was hardly the vibrant, artistically energetic personality that gave the world "Home Thoughts from Abroad" or "Incident of the French Camp."

As mentioned before, Miss Davis did well with the part Katherine Cornell has played for many years. She could improve her effectiveness by working on voice improvement. As it is now, it is thin and a trifle harsh to the ear.

Worthy of mention in smaller roles were Fred Vogel, Henrietta Campbell, Jane Staus, and Edward McCoy. Vogel and Campbell in particular exhibited a good sense of comedy coupled with a convincing characterization.

On the debit side of the ledger was Anne Condrin, who showed a remarkable lack of comic talent. She zoomed along at an alarming rate, which had the favorable feature of getting her off the stage that much faster.

The others were of the caliber of most amateur productions. The fact that the costumes were good helped them all. Some of the makeups, however, were ineffective. The setting, as usual, was well designed and well constructed.
