COMMUNICATIONS

To CONTINUE TO PROVIDE the world's finest telephone service—this is the objective of the Bell System.

It takes the combined efforts of scientists, manufacturers, and associated operating companies . . . such as The Bell Telephone Company of Pennsylvania.

Continuous research and exploration is the function of the Bell Telephone Laboratories. From these laboratories, one of the world's great research organizations, have come significant advances in telephones, cable, loading coils, repeater tubes, switchboards, dial apparatus, coaxial cable, radiotelephone systems . . . the very fabric of modern communications.

From these laboratories, too, are coming developments which will be ready for general use in the near future: Toll dialing, microwave radio relay systems, power-line carrying apparatus for transmitting telephone calls over rural electric power lines, short-wave radio systems for extending telephone service to isolated places out of reach of wire and cable lines.

And for the tomorrow after tomorrow, still more amazing equipment . . . some of it already in the blueprint stage.

Behind each of these developments lie the skill and imagination of many college-trained men and women. More than ever, the communications system of tomorrow depends on the college classroom of today.
