Not Enough, Gov. Duff

Thanks, Governor Duff. The Legislature sent you bills appropriating $15,997,000 for Penn State in the next two years for several reasons. It felt that this amount was necessary not only to maintain the College but help it become the great university it should be in a state which is the second largest in wealth and population in the nation.

By the time you finished slashing the various bills all that remained was $9,800,000—a total reduction of $6,197,000.

We realize, of course, that you had to trim almost every bill sent you by the Legislature because the appropriations so greatly exceeded budget estimates. We are grateful also that the sum you did approve was greater than your original estimate.

But how will Penn State, its students and its faculty be affected by the reduction?

The University of Pennsylvania, despite the Commonwealth's generous rise in appropriations, must increase tuition in order to maintain its "traditionally high standards of education." Don't you believe that students attending The Pennsylvania State College are entitled to an equally high standard? Or must the College, in order to maintain these standards boost tuition to the point where it is no longer possible for people with small incomes to get a college education?

And what about the thousands of qualified people who are clamoring for admission? Can a state institution simply tell these people that there is no room for them?

Also having had its budget requests slashed, the University of Wisconsin is in somewhat the same position as Penn State. The Wisconsin Board of Regents in a survey revealed that it would have to increase student fees, decrease research and public services, and sharply limit the number of students. It also expressed the fear that many professors and instructors would be lost to neighboring institutions that are offering higher salaries.

And why is Wisconsin complaining? Because it received an increase of only 32 per cent in appropriations instead of a requested 57 per cent.

And what about other schools? The University of Minnesota, for instance, has received a 57 per cent increase in state funds over last year. Indiana University's budget has been practically doubled. The Universities of Iowa, Illinois, and Michigan are also faring very well.

It is true that two years ago the Commonwealth set aside $3,618,000 for post-war class room buildings, but costs have practically doubled. One College employee quipped, "It is going to be a funny looking campus with only false fronts for buildings."
