

ONE MAN'S MEAT

By Ben French

Phineas T. Glockenspiel, Collegian's feline political analyst, was still complaining about the weather when we ran into him yesterday, carrying in a load of coal.

"This weather will be the death of me yet," Gloccky griped. "Only good thing about it is that we'll be in condition for the Russian front!"

"Yes, that's true," we chuckled as we lit our pipe. "Tell us, Gloccky, what do you think of the College Administration's policy of barring student political groups from using campus facilities?"

"I don't agree with it at all," Phineas meowed. "With only about 40 per cent of the registered voters participating in national elections, it would seem that one of the duties of the College would be to encourage more interest in politics. So what does the College do? They prohibit meetings of political-minded students on campus."

"Sure, I understand the Administration's viewpoint. It's afraid of the reaction in Harrisburg when it is learned that a 'Students for James Petrillo' or some other group is meeting at this state institution. But what would be the harm? The healthiest thing I can imagine would be Republican, Democrat, Wallace, Socialist, and all the other clubs meeting on campus, talking over the issues of the coming campaign."

and developing interest that would turn out a large vote at the next election.

"Certainly, if the 'Students for Wallace' group were allowed on campus, the Republicans and Democrats would soon follow with requests for their own groups. Would that be bad? I don't think so."

"The College's answer to this problem is 'if you're interested in politics, why not go out for student politics! Now student government is a worthy thing. All-College Cabinet is an indispensable organization with many worthwhile projects such as NSA, the Co-op and Student Union but there are those whose vision lies further than these Nittany hills. They should have a chance too."

"Besides, those groups would be the ideal laboratory periods for the political science classes," P.T. mused. "But I guess that students like children should be seen and not heard," he added as he crawled away in search of a mouse.

Needless Restriction

TO THE EDITOR: An open letter to the Dean of Women—This letter is in protest to your regulation requiring women undergraduate students to be in at 10 o'clock during between-semester vacation.

To require a woman student, of legal voting age, in State College early due to transportation difficulties, to be in her room at 10 p.m. when college is not in session, and studies are not being considered, is certainly inconsistent in an educational center which in other phases is handled in an adult and progressive manner.

Such a rule seems to be needless restriction. Needless restriction is often conducive to non-cooperation.

• Official College policy, according to Dean Weston, is that girls are not supposed to be in the dormitories during vacation periods. In exceptional cases permission is granted to students to use their rooms during vacation. This necessitates a hostess (who is also on vacation) to remain on duty until the girl comes in. The 10 p.m. limit was set "for the girls' own safety as well as consideration of the hostess involved."

Odd Facts Dept.

TO THE EDITOR: As of general interest about Jan. 20th's "Twisted Tale" the answer to the question—"What was your last position, sir?"—should have read: Folding large pieces of paper, in half, in half, in half, in half, in half, in half. You can fold a piece of paper in half only seven times and still maintain a smooth crease. It cannot go on indefinitely. Try it!

A Mad On

by Elizabeth Woodward
America's foremost authority on young people's problems

Your doctor pounds your bent knee with his little mallet and your foot is supposed to give a hefty kick. Just to prove you have nerves. And there are some who say getting riproaring furious proves you have feelings. Your blood courses through your veins, your temperature soars, there's color in your face...you're very much alive and kicking. When your feelings are pinched, pricked or trod on...they react.

I'll go along with that...and a bit farther. If you never get mad you're a very placid cow. Nothing disturbs you...nothing ruffles you...nothing makes you see red. Which is plenty dull. Getting a good mad on does relieve the monotony.

You can let off streams of steam. Splutter words that resound and reverberate. You can flail your arms, break dance records, throw books, slam doors. You can blow your top!

If you'd just explode and get it over with! But those brooding fires are something else again. They consume your good nature, gnaw away at your good sportsmanship, dark-cloud your fun...they last too long. They turn into grudges and prompt you to spiteful tricks and malicious remarks.

It's more refreshing to volcano and forgive. But even that will lose its effect if you seethe over every little thing. Your boyfriend might have danced more than you think necessary with that raven-haired vixen. The girls might have left you out when they planned that big weekend. Maybe the boys had something to offer your steady more intriguing than dates with you three Saturday nights in a row. Maybe your roommate did borrow your new dress without asking you for it. Commotion-causers all of these...but nothing to incinerate over! Save your righteous fury for big moments...and make them count. If you spill it out in frequent small doses...you'll get a rep for being just plain disagreeable. Stifle your petty hurts and resentments until something really big comes along. Then hand out free tickets to watch your fireworks.
