

French Press Satirizes College 'Love' Courses

By ANNE KOVALENKO

How Americans are learning about love at universities is the subject of a satire recently printed in a French newspaper circulated in this country.

In poking fun at our "marriage clinics" and "cours d'amour," the newspaper Carrefour specifically mentions Dr. Clifford R. Adams, calling him "without doubt, the most celebrated marriage specialist in the country."

The method employed by this doctor, it brings out, consists of questioning marriage prospects at great length in regard to their ancestors, their virtues, their faults, and their ambitions. Through an examination approaching psychoanalysis, prospective mates learn whether their marriage has any chance of success or whether it is doomed to failure, says Carrefour, formerly an underground organ.

Quickly popularized by the press and leading women's magazines, Carrefour said the whole country was set agog over the accomplishments of American marriage specialists and their "cours d'amour" as conducted in the clinics.

The Gallup Institute, without which Americans never attempt anything of importance, Carrefour asserts, has done its share in connection with the marriage problem. Throughout the country its representatives recently asked the question "What do you dislike most about your mate?"

Men answered the question with, "She is troublesome, extravagant, independent as the devil, does not know how to cook or keep house, and is too much interested in other men."

Women complained that men were "too egotistical, drank too much, lacked foresight and amiability, and were prone to give orders concerning things they knew little about."

Even Hollywood's opinion was sought concerning marriage counsel, quoted Carrefour. For example, Joan Davis, asked whether it's best to marry for love or money, is quoted as saying, "For love, of course, at least the first time."

Alexander Woolcott, the late noted radio commentator replied, "You can always borrow the necessary money for a marriage of love. Try at first to do the contrary."

Marriage courses haven't accomplished their purpose despite their elaborate methods, the article cynically concludes. The American divorce rate is as high as ever. Following the anguish of war and the battle of prices, it seems that the battle of love is destined to become the number one problem in the United States.

Only Students Can Rebuild Europe Says Former UNRRA Specialist

The present generation of European students will be the persons who will rebuild the Continent, states Dr. C. S. Anderson, professor of Agricultural Education at the College, and former UNRRA official.

Dr. Anderson served as an UNRRA specialist on staple supplies in Poland during 1945-1946. While carrying out his assignment, Dr. Anderson visited nearly all of the important colleges and universities of Poland. Student conditions are deplorable, adds Dr. Anderson. College buildings are piles of rubble, text books are nonexistent, and food and clothing for students is at a bare minimum.

Despite overwhelming handicaps, Dr. Anderson reports that "eager students are making a colossal effort on their own accord to better their conditions." Students are trying to bring school supplies of all types into Poland. While with UNRRA, Dr. Anderson, with the aid of the French ambassador to Poland, enabled three destitute Polish pre-medical students to fly to Paris in quest of urgently needed supplies.

Dr. Anderson believes that students who can persevere under conditions which exist today will build a better Europe. Although foreign students are helping themselves tremendously, Dr. Anderson feels that they need outside help.
