

A Press for All

In spite of "professional" rivalry, staff members of all campus publications, from candidates to editors, are in accord on an issue of major concern to them—immediate acquisition of a student press.

The positions of power occupied by the editors may cause non-publication students to suspect ulterior motives of personal gain in their efforts to sponsor a project which would actually benefit the student body as a whole.

Publishing a college newspaper is big business, about $20,000 worth annually, for the Daily Collegian. Those closely associated with it realize the financial savings, increased efficiency and convenience, and improved service that would accrue from a student plant.

Job-printing requirements of other student organizations are legion. Players and Thespians programs and tickets, chapel schedules, election ballots and dance tickets are but a random sampling of the type of work which could be done quicker and cheaper with a student press.

Thus it can be seen that publications staffs are not solely interested in their own personal welfare, but that the realization of their aims would be a distinct boon to the entire student body.
