

We the Women
By Frances Keeney

Simmons Hall now is unofficially two weeks and two days old. We say unofficially because even though coeds have been taking advantage of its luxurious living, the dorm is still unfinished and has not been turned over to the school.

But even in its unofficial stage the modernness and splendor of this palatial hotel-like edifice has been keeping the gals goggy-eyed. Never a day passes without some little unusual incidents popping up, like the day the painters locked a girl out of her room and she desperately in need of some appropriate attire, or the time two Simmons Hallites were stranded in the elevator between the third and fourth floors.

Elevators on Top

Of all the conveniences in Simmons, the elevators are rated on the top of most coeds' lists. They are quite fascinating, totally self-operating, and although girls sometimes find themselves going down when they had pressed the up button, the ride is thrilling and enjoyable.

The newest additions to this coeds' haven are six ping pong tables in the recreation room, a beautiful grand piano, venetian blinds in the dining rooms, and a blond wood radio-vic combination.

Square Bath Tubs

Coeds, even with carpenters banging about the halls or painters hanging out of windows. They boast about their square bath tubs, and even when one group was forced to put their sofa in the bathroom because of a rushing party in the chapter room, the girls rose to the task.

Penn State coeds share the opinion of a Bucknell visitor who, after being shown through the lobbies, terraces, etc., he muttered, "Gee! I don't believe that girls in any other school could possibly live in such a beautiful dorm!"
