Wool Pool's Founder Pools Wool

Animal Husbandry Prof Has Handled Lots of It

You can't pull the wool over the eyes of William B. Connell... not when you're talking about wool.

As professor of animal husbandry extension and originator of the Pennsylvania wool pools, Connell has handled more than 18,000,000 pounds of wool.

Higher Grade Wool

The wool pools, organizations of farmers formed to market their wool, were started more than 30 years ago to help farmers put their wool in better shape—cleaner and of higher grade. Today about 250 tons of wool are marketed yearly by these organizations.

"There are now 31 co-ops covering 52 counties and 4500 farmers, and they're getting a much better price for their wool than they used to get in the old days," Connell explains.

1,500,000 Pounds Yearly

Connell also points out that Pennsylvania produces about 1,500,000 pounds of wool a year, not much compared to some of the great wool-producing states. But he explains that there is some fine wool produced by the Keystone State, especially in Washington and Greene counties.

As an extension man, Connell travels among the sheep growers of the State, covering some 25,000 miles a year. He provides them with the latest information on treating their flocks for internal parasites, and helps them with other troubles.

College Alumnus

Connell, a native of Edinboro, and a graduate of the College, took advanced work at the University of Wisconsin. He also attended the Edinboro State Normal School, where he was a tackle on the first football team.

Reared on a farm, Connell has been around sheep from his earliest days. Much of his knowledge about sheep and wool he attributes to his experiences as a boy on the farm, as well as to his later experience as a helpmeet of Pennsylvania sheep growers.

Who's Who Copies Now Available At Student Union

All students whose biographies are included in the 1948-49 issue of Who's Who in the News at Penn State can now pick-up their copies of the publication at Student Union, according to Selma Zasofsky, associate editor.

Graduating Seniors are especially requested to comply in order that excessive mailing can be avoided.

In addition to the two copies going to each biographee, Who's Who will be sent to the colleges, universities and leading newspapers of Pennsylvania. Local distribution includes campus libraries, fraternities, clubs, sororities, independent organizations, campus publications, departments and administrative offices of the College.

B-X Positive Step

TO THE EDITOR: According to reports from Collegian and the B-X committee our co-op store will be a reality next semester.

This is an excellent example of student government working for the students, and will be a great benefit to us.

The B-X is a positive step toward a Better Penn State and I'm sure it will be successful.

—Dick Goodling.

No Laughing Matter

TO THE EDITOR and the Resident Counselor of Pollock Circle: Why should officers be elected for next semester without the participation of future dorm residents as was proposed by the Pollock Circle Council?? This is an insight of a supposedly democratic body proposing an undemocratic measure. The election did not take place in the dorm of which I am a resident because the residents adjudged it to be undemocratic.

Your job as far as I can determine is to create interest in the Pollock Circle Council, but by your actions you are detracting from the importance of this group. You, like so many others in responsible positions, think you can run an organization with friends of your own choosing. I would like to see the time come when different positions will be given according to scholastic average, personality, and financial need.

It is up to you to consider this letter and not to just laugh it off as a whim of a disgruntled self.

—Name withheld.

• Letter cut. Joe Errigo, resident counselor of Pollock Circle, stated that he favored holding the elections next semester, when the new residents would be present.

He added that positions, such as mail clerk, are generally given to men with the longest time in residence, whose applications have been submitted.

FAREWELL SENIORS!

Graduation is rapidly approaching and another fine group of Penn State Seniors will leave us. We would like to wish those seniors the best of luck in their future undertakings. Anytime you return come in and see us!

College News:

And to those students returning for the spring semester, we now have an entire stock of all school supplies, and our book shelves will be filled when you return for registration with all those books that you may need.
