

Students Work and Help Navajos In Summer Camp

(This is the first in a series of eight articles on summer work camp experiences of several members of the student body. Further information concerning such work camps can be obtained at the PSCA office, 304 Old Main.)

As told to the Daily Collegian by Paul Rever, a member of the Friends Society Work Camp in Aneth, Utah, last summer.

Aneth, Utah, consists of one trading post and a government school for Navajo Indian children. It is 45 miles to the nearest town, in southeastern Utah.

The work camp consisted of 22 campers, the director, and his wife. The group represented a cross-section of all parts of the United States. One woman was from the Tuscarora Indian Reservation of New York state. The campers included farmers, students, nurses, professors, and others, and was composed of men and women of all ages, with the majority in the student age group.

It was a great satisfaction to all of us who attended to know that through the little we did while there 65 more Navajo children can get a crack at something we take for granted, but which they cherish dearly.

The work was quite diverse, but we had one main objective in mind. We erected buildings, built a pump house, etc. The construction of quonset huts was the big job, but they were finished in three weeks. The school, which had not been used for several years, looked better in its new paint job, roof, and plaster. The pump house was built with the able assistance of the Navajo stone masons.

A job of a little different nature took several fellows into the Hogans, mud homes, of many of the Navajos in the community to get a survey of school age children. There are about three or four times as many school age children as the school will hold.

Assure Navajos of Aid

The objective we all had in mind was to meet the Navajo and to give him some assurance that there are some white men who want to help the red men. This was done in several ways—through medical care, a community day program, soft ball games with Navajo youths, and in the little contacts we had with the Navajo during the two months we were there.

Library Requests Return of Posters

Two posters were stolen from the bulletin boards on the second floor of the library over the weekend. One of these was part of the "Invest Your Summer" exhibit sponsored by the Students Christian Association; the other was from the La Vie display. Miss Elsa Lisle, circulation librarian, has requested that the posters be returned because others aren't available.
