From Dandelions to Orchids Flowers Carry Own Meaning

By Helene Krebs

Since the days when the caveman brought his fair beauty a big bouquet of dandelions, most flowers have been a symbol of love. Many people fail to realize, however, that every flower has a meaning of its own. Woe to the Casanova who wishes to prove his love by sending a girl carnations, for he is really showing his disdain for her.

If a boy send his girl a corsage of white rosebuds, he is saying, in effect, "You have a heart that knows not love." But the girl who wears camellias knows she holds his destiny in her hands.

Bashful Boy
A bashful lad should send his lady-love violets; while the calling card of a wolf is the yellow rose.

The especially pure and innocent girl is symbolized by daisies; the chaste, by orange blossoms; and the passionate beauty, by red roses.

Lilacs are a sign of the first emotion of love, but for a reconciled couple the lily-of-the-valley means a return of happiness.

The meanings of several other common flowers are: iris, a message; wild rose, simplicity; tulip, a declaration of love; and daffodil, chivalry.

Glamorous Queen

The glamorous queen of corsage flowers, the orchid, means its wearer is a charming, graceful belle.

If the .53 of each Penn State coed's quota of men wishes to know his chances for a happy marriage, he will find his answer in a flower. Early in the morning he must pick a blue cornflower and put it in his pocket. If it is dewey fresh and "true blue" 24 hours later, he will marry successfully. No doubt the superstitious man will remain a bachelor as did his predecessors, who named the flower the "bachelor's button."

"Say it with flowers" is a meaningful phrase, but how does one translate a spring bouquet of bachelor's buttons, carnations, tulips, yellow roses and violets?
