Broadening Outlook

There were some pessimists last year who said that a summer stock theatre couldn't maintain itself in such a small town as State College, but Town and Nine came through with flying theatrical banners to prove them wrong.

This summer, the picture has changed even more . . . and for the better. Town and Nine's increase in popularity can be attributed to several causes: well-aimed publicity, better acting, or the fact that while the town has reached a "summer" population of perhaps 15,000, the cultural level has become that of a much more mundane locality.

WE ARE INCLINED to attribute the theatre's success primarily to the latter cause, although the other factors indisputably have contributed to it.

It is to the credit of State College that Town and Nine has been made an important segment of the summer picture, for such acceptance can mean only one thing: a healthy, broadening cultural outlook, something of which most medium-sized communities cannot boast.

And then, too, there is the all-important example which the group is setting for hesitant would-be actors—arena production can provide a living, and fun for all concerned.

Miscellany ...

After reading about the Evan Pugh Memorial Exhibit lately on display at the College Library, Mrs. G. G. Pond, widow of the former dean of the School of Natural Sciences at the College, expressed the opinion that the exhibit should be a permanent one.

In a letter to the College Library, Mrs. Pond, who resides with her daughter in New Haven, Conn., wrote:

"I wish there might be found a permanent place for the exhibit in order to keep Dr. Pugh's personality ever green in the lives of all succeeding generations of students as well as the consciousness of the debt they owe him and his memory."

The College's exhibit of representative student work in fine arts recently returned to the campus after a seven-month tour of universities all over the country.

The exhibit, which left the campus last November, was one of ten circulated throughout the nation by cooperating colleges through a "round-robin" system. Inaugurated by Virginia Polytechnic Institute, the displays were designed to give students of architecture an opportunity to see what other schools are doing.
