Only Surviving North Pole Observer An Eskimo-Ruhf

By BILL DICKSON

The only living man in the world who has been to the North Pole is an Eskimo named Ootah who lives at Thule, Greenland.

According to Russel Ruhf, a graduate student at the College from Allentown, who visited Greenland this summer under direction of the United States Weather Bureau, Ootah unfurled Peary's fraternity flag at the Pole in 1909.

With Ruhf, went Arthur Dodd of Swarthmore, also a graduate student at the College. They joined 12 American, and 10 Canadian students aboard a Navy icebreaker to take supplies to established weather stations, and to construct others within the Arctic Circle.

Upon reaching Thule, Dodd continued farther west to Resolute Bay while Ruhf stayed at Thule, which by the way, is a joint weather station on Danish soil. It is the only station of six in the area which has a doctor.

"It is almost impossible to realize," said Ruhf, "how uncivilized the Eskimos are. Until 1946, they had never seen a rifle."

Ruhf and a native guide named Kisu, became good friends and occasionally hunted seals together.

"The Eskimos still use the conventional harpoon," he said, "but finish off the seal with a rifle."

"These people are equals among equals, and if four men go hunting, the kill is equally divided."

"I never thought that a people with such a simple society and philosophy existed," he continued. "The words 'conceit, jealousy, hate, and war' are not even in their vocabulary. A true communistic attitude prevails."

Agreement

Canada, America, and Denmark have agreed not to educate the Eskimo, supply any conveniences, or even give them food, said Ruhf. He explains that these countries are afraid that such treatment would spoil these people to the point of making them unfit to even live in such a land where survival depends on ancient customs, instinct, and ingenuity.

The common cold is unknown among the Eskimos, and in 1900, when one man in an English exploring party had a cold, an entire native village was wiped out. However, he continued, almost every Eskimo has tuberculosis. Treatment has just started in the past year.

Temperature

"Many people," said Ruhf, "believe the temperature is constantly below zero. This is not true, however, for in the summer, the average is 40 degrees. The Greenland Ice Cap, 9000 feet thick, and covering 80 percent of the area, melts rapidly causing dry stream beds to become raging torrents."

"Visibility is extremely clear," he continued, "and on a cold, clear day, ordinary conversations can be heard distinctly a mile away."

According to Ruhf, weather experts estimate that the temperature at the Pole has never dropped below 74 degrees below zero, while in Riverside, Wyoming, records prove that the mercury hit a 90 degree low.

Peary's Son

Ruhf also encountered Admiral Peary's son, whose mother was an Eskimo. This man speaks no English and lives in the village with others of his race.

The students left for the States in mid-September. Ruhf flew back, stopping off at several other bases.

Both Ruhf and Dodd are enthused about their experiences and hope to make a return trip to the land of the mid-night sun.

PSCA Members Give a Parsonage Coat of Paint

Mather Starts Project For Milesburg Church

Twenty Christian Association members were busy slinging paint brushes this weekend when they set out to give the Milesburg Baptist parsonage a much needed coat of paint.

The project was started by William G. Mather, rural sociology professor, who recently delivered a sermon at the church. Mr. Mather noticed the parsonage and gave Biddle Atlee, senior in agricultural economics the job of rounding up interested students.

In two weekends the ambitious group has finished the job. The church board of trustees provided the paint and the brushes. Women of the church provided the workers with warm and generous helpings of food.

Rev. John A. Fassett reported that the people at first could not understand why the students wanted to do the job and asked nothing in return.

Students are now planning two more projects. They will aid in the building of a playground at the Milesburg school and assist the State College Jaycees in moving buildings from Scotia for the youth recreation center.
