 was "extreme, illegal and immoral, and damaging to the public relations of the College," according to the New York Times. The College was aware of his New York activities when he was hired last Fall and Morse told him then that the Stuyvesant Town affair did not concern the College, Lorch stated.

Lorch had been recommended for reappointment by Orrin Frink, head of the math department. Last year he was dismissed from a similar position at City College of New York, with no official reason given.

His statement hinted that Metropolitan Life Insurance company, which owns Stuyvesant Town, had intervened to prevent his reappointment here.

The AAUP is investigating and has stated that reappointment should be considered on the basis of Lorch's qualifications, not the issues he supports. Lorch's statement said that a committee might be set up to work for his reappointment and thus prevent possible blacklisting of the College by the AAUP.
