Labor Leaders Begin Institute

Pennsylvania labor leaders, for the fifth straight year, are on campus for the annual Steel Workers' Institute. Approximately 75 of the more than 450 local labor officials and committeemen who are expected to attend one of the four week-long sessions, arrived Sunday, July 9, to begin the first program. New groups will arrive each Sunday for the next three weeks.

Each institute will be broken up into three groups, according to A. S. Luchek, associate professor of economics in extension and chairman of the institute. A basic survey course in "Union and Labor Responsibility" is offered for those who are here for the first time.

The advanced group will have the choice of one of two courses. They will specialize either in "Health, Wealth, and Safety in Collective Bargaining and Legislation," or in "Union Leadership Training."

The institute was founded here in 1946 by the Extension Services of the College and the United Steelworkers of America, affiliate of the C.I.O. Since then, the idea has spread to 11 other colleges and universities throughout the nation.

While on campus, the steelworkers will be housed in the various fraternity houses.

Physics Dept. Plans Affair

The second annual Physics Open House sponsored by the College physics department will be held in Osmond Laboratory from 7 to 10 tomorrow night. The open house is planned especially for science teachers but is open to the public, according to Fred Tracy, instructor of physics in charge of the affair.

The research laboratories will be open for inspection, and a variety of demonstration equipment will be in operation. The program will feature the more interesting and spectacular aspects of research and instruction.

Ultrasonic Siren on Display

The acoustic laboratory's ultrasonic siren will be on display. This powerful siren generates sound waves which will ignite inflammable materials, boil water, and enable marbles to float in mid-air. The siren, which is useful in basic physical research, is now employed in studies of the biological effect of sound waves. At high intensity, these waves may be sufficient to kill insects and small animals after brief exposure.

X-Rac, the electronic brain developed for rapid handling of the calculations involved in crystal structure analysis, will also be on display. This computer, which was recently installed by the College, will solve in a few minutes complicated problems formerly requiring months for solution.

Research Projects To Be Shown

Other research projects on display will include a study of brain waves, computation of bone density of living specimens from x-ray studies, radioactivity, and the electron microscope. Several laboratories will operate exhibits of specially designed large-scale demonstration equipment built by the physics department for demonstration lecture purposes and used in the Auto Lab which toured Pennsylvania towns several years ago.

The open house was instituted as an experiment last summer and was such a success that it is now an annual affair. This year's open house will be followed by a series of popular scientific lectures on Wednesday evenings.

Weaver, assistant dean of the School of Education and assistant director of Summer Sessions, and his wife; Frank D. Kern, dean of the Graduate School, and his wife; and Pearl O. Weston, dean of women.

The same committee which planned last year's reception were in charge of this year's successful affair. Marie Haidt, director of women's physical education, was chairman.

Others on the committee were Christine Salmon, assistant professor of housing and home art, and Edward Mattil, assistant professor of art education, in charge of decorations; Ann Free, assistant professor of foods and nutrition, and Ella Mae Jackson, assistant to the dean of women, in charge of the hostesses; Edith Johnson, supervisor of dining halls for women, in charge of refreshments; and Clarence Sykes, instructor in physical education, in charge of recreation.
