Viewing The Future

Inauguration of President Eisenhower yesterday officially brought to a close the era of uncertainty in Penn State affairs that began with the death of President Ralph Dorn Hetzel Oct. 3, 1947.

WITH THE inauguration past, now is the time to look to the future—to build for the future of Penn State.

Although selection of a President of the stature of Milton S. Eisenhower has brought a confident attitude to the inhabitants of Nittany valley, and although the College today is larger than ever before, nonetheless the possibility that war may break out and may call many young men from the campus casts a black shadow over the future.

But President Eisenhower's selection, we feel, makes certain as bright a future for this college as can be expected under the conditions. Unfortunately, neither he nor anyone else at Penn State can do anything about these conditions.

MOST OF the students, faculty, and staff, we think, will be more than willing to give the new President their complete cooperation. However, we do not expect that President Eisenhower and everyone else on the Penn State campus will see eye to eye in all situations, and there is bound to be some disagreement.

The President's task will be to assess the value of opposing views when disagreement arises, and to take from each argument the ideas which can be most useful to the College. It will be a difficult task involving personalities and conflicting opinions, but we feel confident it will not deter President Eisenhower.

Another major problem facing the new President will be gaining a wider acquaintance with personalities both on the campus and throughout the state. In addition, he will have to acquire a broad knowledge and understanding of Pennsylvania background and present conditions to guide him in his work.

AS PRESIDENT EISENHOWER becomes more acclimated to conditions at Penn State and gains a greater understanding of the College's problems, we feel sure he will bring an ever-improving quality of administration to the College.

Frosh Help Out

A group of freshmen did a fine thing for the College yesterday. At the same time, they illustrated the real relationship—a healthy one—between the freshman class and the hatmen.

WHEN THE junior hat societies, scheduled to usher at the inauguration, arrived on the field, they were far short of the number of ushers needed. So hatmen scattered across the campus, buttonholing every frosh in sight and asking each—as a favor—to help usher at the inauguration.

The response was overwhelming. So many frosh showed up at the gate that with two placed at the entrance to every section, there was still a surplus. These were the "hated" hatmen asking for help, but hardly a freshman refused. After yesterday, the College has strong grounds for pride in its freshman class. —Ron Bonn

Disposal Of A Lion

TO THE EDITOR: In 1944, the Vox Pop radio program visited this campus, and presented to the College a lion cub for a mascot. Those of us who have returned to the campus after a few years' absence are curious as to the present whereabouts of the animal.

—Senior Architectural students
Ed note—The lion is currently in a New York zoo, the same one he was originally taken from. According to Dr. James F. Shigley, a State College veterinarian, the lion only stayed here about one week during which he required feeding every two hours. He was returned since there were no facilities in State College for maintaining lions other than the Nittany football type.

Here We Go Again, Girls

To the editor: Again this question arises. What is wrong with the Penn State coed? Must her pride, conceived in infantile reasoning and nourished by false fronts, prevent her from stooping so low as to attend a vulgar AIM dance.

The time: Saturday night. The scene: the girls' dorms. In nearly every room a light is burning. It is very heart-warming to watch the typical State College coed snuggle up to a good book while her kind-hearted roommate show-ers upon her pity-emancipating words in regard to the coed's unpopularity. Naturally the roommate, in the same condition, expects a shoulder to cry on in return for her kind words of consolation.

To get to the point quickly, wise up, girls. Bellefonte and its taverns are our second choice, but at least they are obtainable and they do produce satisfactory results.

Advice To "Hoodlums"

TO THE EDITOR: . . . In America and Europe I have seen "Black Shirts" "White Cloaks," and rational people, all determined to preserve and/or establish tradition. Recently, in another part of America I have seen a "Black Hatted" organization make remarkable progress.

I would like to tell a small hand-full of "Black Hatted Clowns" to "wise-up". These men I have dubbed HAVOC (Hoodlums And Vandals On Campus). We at Penn State are a big family and have no room for mean behavior.
