Dorm Room Rent

Approval by Nittany dorm council of the administration's revised plan for rents on double rooms occupied by one man is a prime example of the kind of cooperation that will help to make everyone's life at Penn State easier and more amiable. Were some of the other student-administration problems that arise settled as easily, there might be better feeling all around and a less tense atmosphere in which to live.

AT FIRST GLANCE, the administration plan to raise the rent on men living alone in double rooms seemed to be extreme, yet it cannot be denied that those men have—through no fault or merit of their own—greater privileges for the rent paid than men with roommates. It was largely the fact that they themselves were not responsible for their living alone in double rooms that prompted the intense feeling generated.

Under the new plan—already accepted by one of the three men's dorm councils—there will be no rent increase for those men who signify that they will be willing to accept roommates if roommates can be found. Rents will be raised only for those who refuse to accept roommates.

Of course, the new plan will not be balm for every man involved. Some, no doubt, will feel that the rents for those who refuse roommates are too high—they are above the rates for single rooms. Perhaps the administration also can restudy the rental structure with a view to possible downward revision.

Now that the Nittany council and the administration have got together on a plan for settling the issue, it is to be hoped that the other councils will go along with what seems to be the best solution to a rugged situation.

Prof Predicts More Drinking

Modern advertising makes alcohol appear a gateway to success and will cause 25 per cent more people to drink within four years, said Dr. Arthur F. Davis, professor of physical education at the College, Nov. 6 at a symposium and panel discussion of the scientific approach to the alcohol problem.

The meeting, sponsored jointly by local church and community organizations, Alcoholics Anonymous, and the School of Physical Education and Athletics at the College, attracted more than 400 students, faculty and townspeople.

Alcoholics Anonymous was represented by a businessman who spoke on, "Figure the Odds and Face the Facts," and a physician who spoke on, "The A.A.'s Approach to the Alcohol Problem."

Following the speeches a panel discussion was held on questions submitted by the audience. The panel was made up of all the speakers and Norman E. Dettra, superintendent of the Pennsylvania Education and Athletics at the Harrisburg district.
