customers that the part of the exam he had was one-third of the entire test, that it was a multiple choice section, and that it was the part drawn-up by Duckett.

Passeri said Duckett had given this information in class. Reached in Clearfield Wednesday night by Clements, Duckett first denied having seen Passeri that afternoon after class, and then changed his story. He said he had had coffee and played pinocle with him at the TUB. He denied having given any information about the examination to his class.

Clements said that Duckett had told him in an interview yesterday afternoon that, in view of Passeri's statements, Duckett did not wish to make any statement.

Security Measures

During the questioning of Passeri, Clements said "We have adopted security measures in our department that are the most stringent possible. I do not even have a key to where the examinations are kept." Clements said that the examination had not been mimeographed at the time of the disclosure and that Duckett had made up that part of the examination Passeri had in his possession.

"The mere fact that Passeri had part of the examination is an indication that the leak was not inside the office," Clements said. He reasoned that if the leak were inside the office, the entire test and not just part of it would have leaked out.

Only one of the six economics and commerce tests also known to be in the hands of students was known to be on sale on campus, the Collegian has learned. The answers to the Commerce 25 examination were being sold for $25 Wednesday.

Exams Rewritten

Leonard has ordered all six examinations, as well as all others mimeographed in the past few days, to be rewritten. In addition to the Commerce 25 examination, other finals known to have fallen into the hands of students are Economics 50 and 23, and Commerce 50, 30, and 24.

The leak in his department was in the mimeographing process, Leonard explained. A new secretary was assigned to do the mimeographing, and was not aware that she was supposed to turn in bad copies of the test, Leonard said. The secretary threw these copies into a waste basket, and some students apparently recovered them from the receptacle, Leonard said.

Collegian reporters discovered the loss of the finals. Having obtained part of the first question of the Commerce 30 final, they were able to verify that a copy of the legitimate test was missing.

West Dorm Dancers To Hold 'Grand Finale'

Tickets are now on sale at the Student Union desk in the West dorm lounge for the "Grand Finale" dance to be held there Saturday night.

Ray Evert and his orchestra will provide the music for the affair, which is sponsored by the West dormitory dancing class. Tickets are $1 per couple.

Campus Building Contracts Granted

Contracts have been granted for construction of three new buildings on the campus by the General State authority.

A total of $184,774 will be spent in constructing a food processing and research laboratory, farm storage sheds and utility lines. All three contracts have been given to Centre county firms.

The GSA also announced that it will begin accepting bids for the construction of a fourth floor for the Main Engineering building.

PUB, TUB Schedules

The PUB and TUB will remain open until noon, Jan. 27, George Donovan, associated student activities manager, said yesterday. Both will re-open at 8 a.m. on Feb. 1. The Student Union desk in Old Main will remain open between semesters.
