of religious answers to man's plight. Religious ideas and thoughts are only foundations for moral and ethical beliefs, Miller said.

Miller also said that in the 20th century competent scientists and theologians finally got together and they now believe conflict is not inevitable. The West must rely on religious, not scientific ideas for ethics, he said.

Critical Situation

The Rev. Robert L. James Jr., third speaker in the colloquy, said the crisis is not something that has happened since December, and is therefore not a strict crisis, but is a critical situation. Man is at the place where power will either shift to the East, or else be shared with the East, he said.

The ultimate crisis in every man's life is the questions of obedience to himself, or obedience to God, he said. We are displaying obedience to ourselves by striving for national power, and security, James said. God's will should have precedence over these beliefs, he said.

Taylor, who recently returned from China where he observed communism in action, said communism is challenging the youth of China and they are accepting the challenge. He said we are calling youth for military challenge, but not challenge of God.
