Blue Key has elected 28 sophomore men to membership this semester.

Religion Answers Why We Fight

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP)—Why do we fight?

Leaders of Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish faiths have joined in giving their answers to the men in the foxholes and military camps.

Briefly, their answer is: for tolerance, for freedom of worship God, and for the American heritage of democracy.

The ideas are set forth in a series of pamphlets for distribution to the armed forces, here and abroad, by chaplains.

The pamphlets were prepared by 39 religious leaders making up the commission on religious education of the national conference of Christians and Jews.

Honors Day-- er of the program, told the audience of three fallacies—of learning, of labor, and of wealth.

The "chronic fallacy" in learning is that "there is not enough education to go around and what there is should be reserved for the socio-economic elite," he said.

Furthermore, he added, what can be learned is limited, according to this theory, and the sooner we learn it and get out the better it is for everyone involved.

Short Experience

"That is the fallacy stripped of its common concealments. To cleave to it, you must believe that whatever the college has to offer should be a short-time experience for the truly bright student," he said.

Stoddard said he believed that time is an all-important element in learning. He compared the time element involved to teach chimpanzees to collect bananas with the time it takes to learn in college.

"I would not claim too much comparability as between chimpanzees and college students," he said, "but there is some overlap."
