

LA Speaker Talks On Liberties

Without peace and prosperity, Americans can only maintain their civil liberties by an organized technique by people determined for freedom, Patrick Murphy Malin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said last night at the final Liberal Arts lecture.

Speaking on "The Daily Practice of Civil Liberties," he said that civil liberties are practiced in daily life by both the people and the government, and that the main problem is the balancing of the necessity for organization and the necessity for freedom.

There are three influences exerted by the people.

First, there is the energetic demand for personal liberties. Second, there is the occasional demand for liberties for other groups. Third, there is the guidance of and pressure put on government.

Malin spoke on the daily practice of civil liberties in government. What government should be interested in is the disloyal acts of people, he said, not their opinions. He said he considers "witch hunting" a deflection of effort from the main purpose.

Malin said that whether the decisions concerning civil liberties are legislators, administrators, or judges, they are usually choices of degree rather than kind.

In a question and answer period, Malin said he didn't approve of the loyalty oath bill now pending in the Pennsylvania legislature. He said he thought

Proposal Offers Revision In L.A.

A proposal to increase history, literature, philosophy, social science, and art-music requirements and to abolish the Lower Division of the School of Liberal Arts was approved Tuesday night by a meeting of the Liberal Arts faculty.

The proposal, which was presented by the Liberal Arts planning committee, will have to be adopted by the College Senate before it can go into effect. This probably would not be before September 1952.

The new plan would require students in Liberal Arts to take six credits each of history, English composition, literature, philosophy, and art-music; three credits of psychology; and four credits of physical education.

Twelve credits each would be required in the fields of languages, natural science or mathematics, and social sciences; 53 credits would be required in the major subject and electives; and men would be required to take six credits of ROTC.

The art-music, history, and philosophy requirements would be raised from three to six credits because the committee feels that a single semester's work in these fields is inadequate. The English composition, psychology, and physical education requirements are unchanged from the present plan.

Lit. Requirements

Journalism, speech, or advanced composition could no longer be substituted for the six credits in literature required. However, these could be elected from American or British literature or foreign literature in translation as long as at least three credits are taken in British or American literature.

The committee recommends that six of the 12 credits in social sciences be taken on one of the following three fields: economics, sociology, or political science, and that three credits be taken in each of the other two fields.

The committee also recommends that the natural science or mathematics credits be taken in not fewer than two of the following three fields: physics, chemistry, and geology; botany and zoology; or mathematics. It also suggests that at least six credits be taken in some one field.

Lab Work Required

If enough laboratory space can be provided, the natural science courses elected will be required to be bona fide laboratory study.

The language requirements, as in the present plan, could be passed by either course work or by examination.

According to the new plan, the number of credits required in electives and the major subject has been reduced from 60 to 53, bringing the total credits for graduation to 132 for men and 126 for women, which is the same as the present plan.

The second part of the pro-

Airmen To Train As Weathermen

Air Force officers will be trained as weather forecasters in a post-graduate program to be started at the College in September, President Milton S. Eisenhower announced yesterday.

Between 20 and 50 newly commissioned Air ROTC officers will be sent to the campus for this training. Dr. Hans Neuberger, chief of the division of meteorology, will be the director.

Seven Colleges Chosen

Penn State is one of seven colleges and universities chosen by the Air Force for the program. The program was established because of the need for skilled meteorologists in the Air Force.

The officers who will be enrolled in the program will hold bachelor's degrees from accredited colleges or universities and will be enrolled as special students.

Upon completion of their work, they will qualify for bachelor of science degrees in meteorology.
