Hubby's Boss Wary Of Wife's Influence

Formerly, movie stars were the only people known to have to pass a screen test for success. Now, wife-screening, according to Fortune magazine, is becoming a familiar corporation practice.

Ordinarily the screening, done to familiarize corporation bigwigs with the influence the wife might have over a prospective employee, is done via "informal" social visits.

If it is impossible to call on the woman in her own home, some corporations invite the wife to come along with her husband for his interview. Since she does not know she is being scrutinized, she does not realize that she is undergoing quite an interview when speaking to any of her husband's prospective employers.

In businesses whose present management group has been long entrenched there is often a feeling that an unwise choice of a couple may upset the delicate social balance achieved over the years.

Amusing as this attitude may seem, it has been found that many men are passed up for jobs because of the poor impressions their wives made on the company, the article states.

Some executives, skeptical of the value of this subjective process of screening, supplement it with more objective investigations; for example, checks on credit ratings and on the popularity of the woman in the community.

The effect of this surveillance on the husband's career is substantial. Typical examples of faults found in wives are "she has absolutely no sense of public relations," or that she is "negative pany."

Divorce rarely disqualifies a man in her attitude toward the company; in fact, one company has a policy of sending executives on extended trips if they need separation from nagging or retrograde wives.

Most executives consider the screening process, important to them as it is, a negative measure. The positive factor, they believe, is to sell the wife on the corporation's point of view. This is done through such mediums as brochures, films, and booklets on the industry.

Other than selling wives on the company, there is a stand to be taken on socializing among company wives. Some companies prefer them to be as close as possible, while others say the less seen of the women the better.

Conflicting Opinions
In the International Business Machines Corp. the wives are "all part of the business" and the people in employment are referred to as the "I.B.M. family," according to Fortune. But an oil company executive says, regarding the wife, "We are just as happy if we never see her at all."

And so it goes. Some companies consider the wife-screening business a form of slavery, while others think it thickens the life blood of the business.

A look at this article would be a little disconcerting to the fiancée about to marry a would-be executive.
