Fate of Goal Posts Hangs in Balance

For the fourth time this season, a new set of goal posts will adorn the green turf of Beaver Field. Each time this season the College has constructed new posts, students, of both the high school and college variety, have contrived to tear them down.

With each succeeding week, as the reasons for the destruction of the goal posts became increasingly obscure, student sentiment has ceased to view the affair as a joke. Sensing this sentiment, All-College Cabinet last week unanimously approved a resolution by Tribunal chairman David Mutchler urging students to refrain from such activity in the future.

Mutchler noted the inherent dangers involved in the massing of crowds around the posts, the fights over possession of parts of the posts, the fact that the cost of replacing the posts is met from student funds, etc. He reminded cabinet—and the student body—that two students had been treated for injuries incurred in the skirmish following the West Virginia game.

But the Tribunal chairman also contributed a thought not presented before: that the destruction of the posts week after week was the start of a negative tradition, a tradition of disrespect for property, a tradition of wanton destruction, a tradition of the College-be-damned.

Mutchler's message was an appeal to the reason of Penn State students. The ability of Penn Staters to reason maturely will be on test Saturday afternoon.

Football Movie

Although sensationally advertised, Saturday's Hero, the movie version of big-time football, is an accurate portrayal of football at its lowest.

Saturday's Hero is the story of the kid from the wrong side of the tracks who is given the opportunity to play football for one of the nation's best colleges. Basically a good student, the boy is turned into a gridiron machine by the pressure of big-time football.

The drama becomes a bit maudlin when the hero learns first that he will never be able to play again because of an injury and then that his father has died. We were expecting to learn next that a mean old banker had foreclosed on the old homestead.

Despite this, some obviously faked football, and other weak spots, Saturday's Hero is a grim warning of the damage inflicted upon the individual by the pressures of over-emphasized athletics.

Tax Lien Is Result Of Bad Organization

The tax lien action which has been filed in the U. S. District Court in Scranton against the Military Ball Committee presents the unusual picture of the federal government taking action against the Penn State military department.

The situation is this: the dance has been run, as far as finances are concerned, by the military department. For that reason the financial end of the operation has not been going through Associated Student Activities. Had the affair been student-run, the committee would have been compelled to handle its finances through ASA.

Chances are, too, that had the ASA been handling the finances the Mil Ball committee would not be in hot water now. Although almost all of the members of the College military establishment are fairly new to Penn State, their predecessors had been warned that they were breaking the law by failing to pay the admission taxes on the tickets.

So the current members of the military, and especially Lt. Walter D. Chadwick, U.S.N., named in the action, are being put on the spot for the failure of the men before them to adhere to the tax laws.

All student affairs calling for the expenditure of money are handled by the Associated Student Activities. Such a procedure has guaranteed responsible handling of what often amounts to thousands of dollars in cash. There would probably be chaos in student financial matters were the ASA not in existence.

The ASA also guarantees consistency over the years in the handling of the finances. It is the same people year after year who handle the finances. They are familiar with all the details and all the financial pitfalls.

For these reasons it would seem to be time for the Mil Ball to turn its finances over to Associated Student Activities.

With Rudolph Halley's election Tuesday as New York City council president, television moves into a new field—politics.

Halley went into the election an underdog to Joseph Sharkey, the Democratic candidate, and emerged victorious by a smashing 200,000 vote plurality. Why this upset? If you remember, Halley was the nasal-voiced prosecutor for the Kefauver crime investigating committee and appeared on the nationally televised programs of the committee's proceedings.

Halley also used the video medium extensively in his campaign, more extensively than any of the other council president candidates.

Most experts believe Halley's popularization through television was an important factor in his upset victory.

Thus TV moves into the field of politics. In almost every city with a television station, the candidates used the medium in their campaigns. The Halley upset was just the most startling example of the influence this new medium has on the video audience which in New York is larger than in other sections of the country.

We can look forward to a future when candidates with exuberant TV personalities will be sure-fire political bets. There is no doubt that Halley and his New York accent has a tremendous appeal to the average housewife and her spouse.

The 1952 presidential race may very likely be the first election in which the United States chief executive will be elected partially on his television personality. President Truman, Sen. Taft, and other hopefuls had better take note and start developing some of that Arthur Godfrey TV appeal.

Speaking of television and the related electronics field, David Sarnoff, top man in the Radio Corporation of America, has pointed out in a recent issue of U.S. News and World Report that facets of American life will be changed radically because of new developments in the electronics field.

Sarnoff has in mind electronic household appliances which would have no movable parts. An electronic air conditioner, for instance, would have no pumps, fans, or noise. This air conditioner would be cheaper to buy and easier to operate because of the elimination of movable parts.

As for communication, Sarnoff claims that electronics will be
