

Millstream--

Perhaps, if the U.S. chucked its famous dollar diplomacy—that is demanding strict conformity to American standards in return for economic aid—the U.S. might be more successful at convincing other states it is serious in trying to avoid another world conflict.

If there were some way of getting across to these little people of the world that we little people of America were just as eager to see a peaceful settlement of the "cold war," there might be more of a chance for avoiding World War III.

Just as the Germans, in their extreme economic plight following World War I, turned to fascism and Hitler, these other pitiful peoples may turn to imperialistic communism for a way out following World War II.

The only solution may lie in getting to these little peoples and sincerely trying to help them with their problems toward recovery from the last conflict and in that way avoiding another conflict.

War seems to breed war, and the hopes for world peace seem to get more precarious after each one. We're wondering if it might be possible to stop the war-like progression of the last 150 years. Otherwise there may not be much hope for the future. We think there's good cause for feeling mighty low about the whole deal.

Lowenfeld--

(Continued from page one) ences in psychological attitudes. Lowenfeld showed various slides and described them in some detail to show clearly these two concepts of creativity.

A peculiar technique of a blind sculptor is that he models with the head facing in the same direction as the sculptor himself is facing, he said.

In the space of value, important things to us appear large, and insignificant things small. These are illusions Lowenfeld explained, and so illusions are expressed in art.

Having worked with the blind and the partially blind for 15 years, Lowenfeld said three stages of development in art are able to be distinguished. The first is the diffused representation of the total image, the second is the structural stage, and the third is of inner expression.

Lowenfeld also stated some main points pertaining to primitive art.

Farmer Releases New Issue Today

The current issue of the Penn State Farmer will be distributed today and tomorrow, David Stabler, editor, announced yesterday.

The issue will feature articles on barn raising and foreign agriculture students at the College.

Book Plan--

When new editions of books are printed the instructor shall make the differences known to his students. If no essential improvements have been made, the student may choose the book he prefers. If essential differences occur, it is reasonable for the instructor to require his students to have the most recent editions.

4. Students shall be encouraged to bring to the attention of the various student councils any problems arising from the selection of textbooks.

The resolution passed by the Senate differs from the one proposed to the Council of Administration chiefly in the manner of selecting the textbooks.

The original proposal recommended that each school appoint a committee of five faculty members and two students to approve all changes in textbooks and to study grievances in ordering and selecting new books. The students would not have had a vote on the committee.

It further suggested that in order to change a text, an instructor must propose the change to the department head. If he approved, the change would go to committee for further study.

Under the present plan, students are not represented in an advisory capacity. All changes are made by the department members deciding on the books to be used.

Louis Bell Starts New Daily Column

Louis H. Bell, director of public information, started a new daily column, "Once over Lightly," yesterday in the Centre Daily Times.

Bell's column has been introduced to take the place of the late Dean Arthur R. Warnock's column, "Half Colyum," which appeared in the Centre Daily Times daily for 27 years. Dean Warnock, Penn State's first dean of men, died Nov. 4, 1951.

Trustees--

(Continued from page one) voted unanimously to appropriate $11 to pay half the cost of the award. The trophy will be held back until this year's game because of the tie game last season.
