

Haberdasher Says . . .

'Weaker Sex' Adept At Picking Out Ties

So the tie you were knitting for him turned out to look more like a kite string than a tie? Why not swallow your pride and venture to buy one ready-made?

A nationally known Fifth avenue creator of men's haberdashery believes that women should choose men's ties, and who is the "weaker sex" to dispute his opinion? "Not only do women have an innate sense of color and design," this authority observed, "but they probably know the personality of the man who is to wear the cravat better than the man knows himself."

Not Too Flashy

Despite a belief currently popular in America that women shop for the most atrocious designs and impossible colors when they give ties as gifts—birthdays, or just to show they're still interested—actual purchases of ties prove otherwise.

The haberdasher is of the opinion that women make excellent selection of ties, whether they are choosing four-in-hands or bows. While of course there are exceptions, the authority contends that most females don't tend to choose anything that's too flashy, effeminate or otherwise unacceptable to men.

The Fifth avenue haberdasher offers a few hints to coeds who are contemplating the selection of a tie for a current flame. He suggests that she keep in mind specific items of the particular male's wardrobe, and choosing colors that will blend in best with the suits and shirts he prefers to don when he goes out with her.

Raging Tiger

The authority points out that one must also keep the personality factor in mind, choosing ties that will appeal to the man for the personality he thinks is his.

For example, although your one-and-only may be a guy of slight build, it is possible he fancies himself a raging tiger. His ties should reflect that belief.

Conversely, a six-foot hulking brute may harbor the thought that beneath his many layers of muscle lies the soul of an aesthete. He'll love his neckwear reflecting that belief, the tie designer points out.

Men Need Watching

"When it comes to choosing clothes," the authority concludes, "a stroll along any American street will prove that our gals have better taste than most. So no one has to caution them about giving ties that are outrageous riots of color and design."

"Oftimes," he says, "it is the men who need watching when they purchase neckwear. At times they tend to go 'way overboard.' Despite what the authorities say, it's quite possible he'll not like your tie selection in the least. But counting on the male sex's sweet amiability, which at times is itself quite questionable, he's bound to be pleased that you at least thought of him."

Paradise --

Our pockets lighter and our outlook dimmer, we droned on into the perilous northland.

We discovered something quaint about Vermont road signs. When they say "Bump" they mean "Bump." We hit the roof several times before this fact sank in. Also, every mile or so, imposing-looking signs in fine print flash before your eyes.

These signs indicate that the State of Vermont would appreciate your cooperation in keeping speeding to a minimum, under penalty of fine and/or imprisonment. Due to past experience, we kept it down.

Along the line of road signs, we found that New England, aside from being the coldest possession of the United States, is populated by all the practical jokers who've ever been deported from same. They especially like road signs.

We caught on to their little tricks after we saw a mammoth "85 mile limit" sign that obviously was misplaced. A few strokes of the brush had been enough to transform an innocent "35 mile" sign into an eye-catching phenomenon. We didn't catch on, however, until we had gotten lost three times from humorous diddlings such as turning route signs around, changing mileages on them, and pointing arrows in the opposite direction. This type of humor would have done credit to (ugh) Froth.

The crowning touch, however came in the city of our destination itself. Upon arrival, we saw a sign saying "Manchester, business district," and an arrow pointing back in the direction we had come. We dutifully turned around and headed back for some 40 miles before it dawned on us that this couldn't be right. We turned around, drove back, ignored the sign, and we're arrested again for speeding.

Thus we arrived at our new home away from home. More will doubtless be forthcoming, for we've never moved to any place where it didn't.
