Change of Policy Could Aid 'Dimes'

After much confusion, passing the buck, and some old-fashioned fast-talking, the mystery of the missing March of Dimes check has finally been cleared up.

The check in question was the one for $382.33 presented to the March of Dimes by Campus Chest last year.

The check was never actually missing. It had been cashed and the March of Dimes had accepted the money. It should be made clear for all at this time that not once in this entire controversy has there been any question of the honesty of the Campus Chest officials.

The facts make it hard to believe the March of Dimes claim that last year's Campus Chest check was "anonymous" and was acceptable for that reason. The anonymity of the contribution was claimed by local officials since it is national March of Dimes policy not to participate in community fund-raising campaigns.

The canceled check produced by the Chest bears the typewritten signature, "Penn State Campus Chest Student Fund." There would seem to be little doubt as to the source of the money.

The check was accepted then because Chest officials were aware that the Campus Chest was the best way to solicit funds on the Penn State campus. Since the Chest provisions of All-College Cabinet say there is to be no other soliciting on campus, the Chest was not only the best way to reach Penn State students, it was the only way.

In addition to the money contributed to the March of Dimes by the Chest, an additional $1000 is raised for the polio fund by the Discs for Dimes program on WMAJ. By these two means, the polio fund gets more money from Penn State students than any other worthy cause except the Penn State Christian Association.

As the situation now stands, the March of Dimes will return $382.33 to the Chest from last year and refuse to accept a donation for about the same amount for this year.

The only loser by such a move will be those unfortunate enough to be attacked by polio. The simple fact is this: The March of Dimes either participates in the Campus Chest or loses the money which might be contributed by Penn Staters.

We can see where there would be good reason for the March of Dimes to refuse to participate in various community chests across the country. But the fund's leaders are being completely unrealistic in their attitude toward a college campus where the provisions are for one and only one collection of welfare and charity funds.

In a community, the March of Dimes can solicit on its own and probably get more than it would by participating in a fund drive. But the March of Dimes cannot do that at Penn State.

The realistic, practical thing for the March of Dimes to do would be to make exceptions for college campuses having collection provisions similar to those of Penn State.

Lawrence College Hits Legion Right

A pat on the back is in order for the Board of Trustees at Sarah Lawrence College of New York for its handling of charges of communism-in-the-faculty.

The charges were made by—guess who?—the American Legion. The charges came in the form of a series of 14 questions submitted to the College, which implied that Dr. Harold Taylor, college president, and three members of his faculty were sympathetic to pro-communist and subversive groups.

The only statement made by the trustees defended "the integrity and scholarship of its faculty," and informed the Legion that that would be the only reply to the charges.

In days such as these when mere accusation of subversion is sufficient to make some quake in their shoes, the action of Lawrence trustees stands as an act of courage, an act of defiance to red-baiting, an act complying with the best which can be called American.

Collegian Errs in Change Of Stand on Athletes

TO THE EDITOR: It seems most strange to me that the Collegian, who supposedly represents campus opinions pro and con on different questions which arise, has taken such a biased stand on the recent dismissal of the three athletes from College. Collegian, which last semester gave the two football players in question such headlines as "Shattuck Selected as Athlete of the Week," "Mentioned on the Collier's Regional Grid Team," "Selected All-East by INS," and the more than numerous articles on the Anders injury and how it was hampering the team for the loss of such a terrific back even temporarily, plus the headlines on his scoring, today came out with the unjust statement, "When a scholarship athlete remains in college for a year or two and is then dropped from the rolls for academic deficiencies, it can be likened to an investment which fails to mature. One or two years of training and one or two years of scholarship money are washed down the drain."

This is not the case; money has not been wasted and the investment has not failed if anything it has matured more rapidly than expected in that as juniors Anders and Shattuck had already made a name in the field of sports. Is that failure?

Granted that athletes must be students as well as scholars, this is now proved by the College, but do not distort and shame athletic ability because of scholarship. There is no direct relationship between the field and classroom.

As for the statement, "Any college which is the home of an athletic goon is prostituting a sacred trust," these boys were brilliant in their field. Who are we to judge what makes an athlete fall down in scholarship?

•Letter Cut

—Nancy Graham

(Ed. Note: If Reader Graham feels "There is no direct relationship between the field and the classroom," we suggest she make a study of the scholastic averages of athletes and other students. Athletics do cut down—appreciably—on scholastic standing, so that the athlete must be capable of doing his college work in less time than is required by the non-athlete.

Accomplishment in the field of sport is no mean accomplishment, nor will we allow ourselves to be accused of minimizing such accomplishment. Those athletes who were dropped from the rolls may have outstanding athletic ability, but to be COLLEGE athletes they must be capable of and willing to do college work. If they are not, they should display their ability on a professional basis.)

A Bonn Mot

By RON BONN

This past week we've been resuming our semi-annual study of that distinctive humanoid species, the Prof. By the third or fourth week of the semester, the Prof tends to pall on one, to fade away to a hardly noticed annoyance—a thrice-weekly buzz in the ears, a routine abomination to the sight, a creature to be outwitted more or less as a matter of course. But during the first week the impressions are sharp, the distortions and irregularities clear and painful. It is only during this first week that the Prof can be accurately catalogued.

To proceed, out of common decency, in the order of seniority, we begin with the Old Prof. This species enters the classroom at a brisk dodder, drops an interminable series of ancient and illegible notes on to the desk before him, scrawls a shaky and unpronounceable name on the board, and snarls through a clacking set of teeth, "Mumble mumble mumble mumble BAH!" He gives you his name, which you know, the text's name, which you know, the meeting date, which you know, the absolutely-no-cuts-under-any-circumstances policy, which you guessed, and, casually picking his teeth with a Phi Bet key, dismisses the class.

Next there is the Prof Whose Class is Too Large. This is a manly fellow, who will tell of his silent suffering vocally and at great length, and then try to talk you into getting into another section. "Old Zilch (the other prof) is a capital fellow, capital. Excellent instructor. Don't forget, too, his class is in Sparks, practically in the middle of the campus while this one is way over in Willard. He uses a chapter text, too. His finger-nails are very
