But now it's almost time for colleges to leave out for the summer. When college students return old sol's rays will be getting shorter. But just to be on the safe side, college officials had best begin a mass campaign to install metal goal posts.

Talk About

The following night after a trampled house mother had been calmed and the college tallied over $700 in damages, the men got loose again, hauled sorority girls from their houses, and daubed them liberally on the extremities with paint. Police finally broke it up.

As we have mentioned, the report of this outbreak in Life sent the craze into high gear.

At Columbia, Mo., the national guard was called out to quell some 3000 University of Missouri students who went wild on their own campus and then, not content, took off and raided two nearby girls' schools.

The disturbance got out of hand in at least one instance, and a red faced male had to beg for mercy as a group of girls calmly stripped off his pants. And, another report disclosed that the converse also occurred.

And so it went . . . A three-hour siege was staged by some 1000 University of Alabama men . . . 600 University of Vermont men went wild at Burlington, Vt., and state police and local cops had to use tear gas to call a halt.

At Northwestern the coeds went on a serenading cruise in front of the men's dorms—some 1000 males responded with a raid on the girls' dorms.

The Associated Press called a 3000 man invasion of the University of Connecticut's sorority quadrangle "a lust for lace."

The University of Wisconsin had another 1000 man raid and at the University of Delaware coeds fought back with fire hoses.

The craze continues to spread, but there were a couple of other incidents in college circles this spring.

Princeton men, learning that the college planned to cut $75,000 in janitor services called a midnight march and sit-down strike which clogged Nassau street for an hour. Armed with pillows, firecrackers, and bags of water, and spurred on by bugles, the students wailed, "We want janitors." Result—Princeton men will make their own beds next fall.

This brings to mind a demonstration several years ago by Villanova students who, displeased at the governing fathers for not installing a traffic light on busy Lancaster Pike upon which the college faces, called a mass demonstration which tied up the busy main line thoroughfare for several hours at the evening rush period. Traffic was jammed up for miles, but they got their light.

And of course Yale men, to return to this spring, could not be outdone, and so in an attempt to beat the raid fad, decided upon
