

Coed Carries Apples To State's Governor

By HELEN LUYBEN

A Penn State coed will take apples to the governor instead of the teacher today. A whole bushel basketful at that.

The girl in question, Joan Packard, is Pennsylvania's apple queen. Joan is one of four girls from Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia who are competing for the title of national apple queen.

A sophomore at the College and a journalism major, Joan was chosen queen by the Pennsylvania Horticultural Association in August. She said, "Girls chosen are usually daughters of apple growers, and are judged on the basis of poise and personality."

To Hand Out Apples

Joan will launch her tour through three major cities of the east next week with her visit to Gov. John S. Fine at Harrisburg. Leaving her bushel basket of apples behind her, Joan will travel to Richmond, Va., Baltimore, Md., and Philadelphia.

Clad in jeans, plaid shirt, and straw hat, Joan, with the other candidates, will visit groceries in those cities, handing out apples to shoppers.

"The people will vote for whom they want to be queen," Joan said, "and she'll go to Washington Oct. 4 during National Apple Week."

Edited Apple Bulletin

The four candidates will make three television appearances, one in each city, and appear on five to seven radio shows.

Joan picked up valuable information on apples during the summer when she wrote and edited an apple bulletin for her father.
