Hort Show Prepares For 10,000

More than 10,000 persons are expected to attend the 39th annual student Horticulture Show today at the Agriculture Stock Pavilion, according to James Boodley, manager.

Displays by the pomology, landscaping, clericulture, plant breeding, floriculture, and ornamental divisions of the School of Agriculture will center around the theme of the show, "A Parisian Market."

Exhibits of specially grown flowers, fruit from College orchards, vegetable and breeding material, and other student products will be featured in a flower market, street scene, and model layout display based on Paris.

Sixty-four evergreen trees have been cut by the Forestry department to form an entrance similar to the Arch of Triumph. A painting of the Eiffel Tower will be featured. Apples and cider will be sold at a stand in a manner similar to that in Paris.

In observation of Pennsylvania Week, a special display will show the principal phases involved as Pennsylvania crops move from fields and orchards to consumer goods. The exhibit will highlight the state's $200,000,000 annual canned foods output.

The student show has been dedicated to Dr. John R. Bracken, professor and head of the division of landscape horticulture. Dr. Bracken has been in charge of landscape instruction at the College since 1926 and is national recognized as a teacher and professional landscape architect.

The Hort Show will be open to the public all day.
