forts to get her signature on a contract are complicated by the appearance of a duo of bearded Germans who have written a passion play; a religious eccentric who pastes "Repent" signs on everything within reach; a lady doctor who has also written a play; a businessman holidaying with his secretary, and a number of others who wander about.

If it were not for Sarachek's stage experience and feeling for his part some of the others, perhaps, would not have shown up so badly. He is the redeeming part of the production and certainly worth seeing.

Better Makeup Might Help

A newcomer, Ray Wasilewski, minces through his part as the sticker-crazy Matthew Clark in a most entertaining manner. John Aniston and Dominic Landro, the two "Beards," make something out of their all-too few appearances.

Ann Wylie's initial appearance with Players seems to be the result of bad casting. In the role of Lily Garland, a woman at least in her late twenties... emotional and temperamental, but with some maturity as the result of her relationship with Jaffe, Miss Wylie acts like a young brat startled, pretty but hollow. Perhaps a better makeup job would have given her an older appearance. (As Miss Wylie looks 20 at the most on the stage, we think of her days with Jaffe with some horror... she would have been approximately 13).

At Home on Stage

Makeup, however, would only change the external trouble, for insight into the character is also lacking. Her shrill denunciations of her lovers and her strutting about are reminiscent of a little girl playing dressups. With more acting experience Miss Wylie should handle an ingenue role quite capably. In this part her main asset is a loud voice.

Jean Risler as Dr. Johnson and Charles Berryhill as press agent Owen O'Malley seem pretty much at home on the stage.

The cast includes Al Sarkas, conductor; Allen Adair, the porter; Ross Bannard, secretary, and Joe Goldstein, employee, Bill Norman, detective, and Renee Kluger, Miss Garland's Cockney maid.

and high school children of State College, I have found the teeth of city children to be superior to those of farm children.

"What might be the cause of this I don't know. Certainly, the city children have easier access to candy stores and after-school sodas. One possibility is that the rural child does not get as prompt dental care or advice as the city child. Country children and their parents should be taught more about dental hygiene. Children should first see their dentist at three years of age.

"There seems to be a period in the life of each person in which he has caries," he said. "This period is usually around puberty. It is during this time that prompt attention is necessary. Too many children do not get this attention. After this time there is little one can do because the damage has already been done. The average college student has several fillings that could have been prevented."

Retired Prof Dies At State College Home

Paul B. Breneman, who retired in 1938 as professor and head of the Department of Mechanics and Materials of Construction, died Oct. 31 at his State College home. He was 81 years old. He served on the faculty from 1894-1900 and from 1908-1938.
