College Trains Weathermen

The College is training weather forecasters for the U. S. Air Force for the second consecutive year.

The program, which has been accelerated to enable them to complete the work in August, has an enrollment of 36 officers, according to Dr. Hans Neuberger, professor and chief of the division of meteorology. A group of 33 Air Force officers completed its training Aug. 29.

Students selected for the program are graduates of accredited colleges who received their commissions through Air Force ROTC programs. When they have completed the year at the College they will be awarded B.S. degrees in meteorology.

Penn State is one of seven colleges chosen by the Air Force to conduct the program designed to provide skilled meteorologists for the air weather service.

To a raindrop, all umbrellas are the same

Yes, the nice part about umbrellas is their similarity. When the need is urgent, any one will work.

When it comes to telephone equipment, however, a general likeness isn't enough. Parts are engineered to be exactly the same no matter where they are used. Only such rigid standardization made possible the smooth and interlocking system that serves you from Penobscot, Maine, to Pescadero, California.

We're reminded of it sharply in times of disaster — from flood, blast or hurricane.

Telephone men from other areas can come and pitch right in with the same methods, tools and equipment.

But one Bell System asset isn't standardized. That is its people. It takes able, original minds to keep our business moving ahead. For college graduates qualified for and interested in such widely differing work as research, engineering, operations and administration, we offer many opportunities.

Your college placement people will be glad to tell you more about it.
