Civil Rights Concern Vital to U.S. -- Reede

America's position of world leadership will be lost if the American public loses concern over civil rights, Arthur H. Reede, professor of economics, said Sunday night at the Hillel Town Meeting.

Neal Reimer, assistant professor of political science, and Edward Abramson, assistant professor of sociology, also spoke on "How Can We Make Our Civil Rights Program More Effective" at the first of this year's forum series. Rabbi Benjamin M. Kahn, Hillel director, moderated the program.

Reaffirm Traditions

Advocating attack at those points which yield most readily, Reede pointed out that while many persons are working for a federal Fair Employment Practices Act, neither Pennsylvania nor State College has enacted such a law, and race and religion are asked for on College job application forms. Local bills would be more effective, as only a compromise bill would get through Congress, he said. Reede said a place to begin eliminating discrimination would be in public employment.

For more effective civil rights, Reimer suggested reaffirming the main currents of American civil rights traditions of free flowering of the personality through freedom of mind, belief in man's rationality, and the idea of the mission America has to perform in the world.

These tenets are deep-rooted in American history, Reimer said, as he quoted Roger Williams, founder of Rhode Island. Williams favored rational thinking, rather than force, for seeking truth, and the striking of a balance between liberty and authority. He feared forced uniformity.

Rights Are Now Ends

Reimer also encouraged supporting those in education who are defending the civil rights tradition. Reimer predicted an attack on educators by quoting Representative Harold H. Velde, prospective chairman of the House un-American activities committee, who said the committee should concern itself mostly with education.

Civil rights, which began as means to an end, are now ends in themselves to many, Abramson said. He traced civil liberties from Alexander the Great, through Cicero and John Locke, to the Magna Carta, pointing out that civil rights are earned by struggle and conflict and the theory comes after the fact.

Led by student members of PSCA, the workshops are designed to provide members with a broader perspective of international affairs, music, dramatics, art, news, worship, or "campus problems."

Students may sign up for the workshops in 304 Old Main before the meeting, Mary Jane Wyland, PSCA program coordinator, said.

Mowat Slated For UJA Speech At Hillel Tonight

Herbert A. Mowat, director of the Canada-Israel Association, will speak on "The State of Israel, Its Present and Future" at 7:30 tonight at the Hillel Foundation, 224 S. Miles street.

A leader in the United Nations Association of Canada and editor of "Canada-Israel Reporter," Mowat is being presented by the Bellefonte-State College Jewish Community in behalf of the United Jewish Appeal. The meeting is open to the public.

His travels through Israel with a delegation of American and Canadian journalists included visits to agricultural settlements and temporary immigrant work villages. He met with pioneers, settlers, government officials, and immigrants in an attempt to learn first-hand the problems of the new state.
