

Lederman Named Harvest Ball Queen

By PEGGY McCLAIN

Ann Lederman was chosen Harvest Ball queen at 10:30 last night in Recreation Hall.

Miss Lederman, a first semester journalism major from Glenside, was chosen over Marcia Philips and Elizabeth Tomlinson by applause. The three finalists were introduced by emcee Harold B. White, assistant professor of physical education.

Judges of the applause were Richard Stanley, president of the Agriculture Student Council; Arthur Rosfeld, president of Interfraternity Council; and Margaret Lamaster, president of the Physical Education Student Council.

The queen, sponsored by Tau Kappa Epsilon, was presented with a large trophy engraved with her name and the title of Harvest Ball queen by Arthur Stone, publicity chairman for the ball.

Youngest Finalist

Small loving cups engraved with their names and titles of finalist for Harvest Ball queen were presented to Miss Philips and Miss Tomlinson.

Seventeen year old Miss Lederman, who was the youngest of the three finalists, wore a pink net gown with a lace halter effect.

The brown-eyed coed is a member of Liberal Arts Student Council and State Party, a Collegian editorial candidate, and a Campus Chest solicitor. She was the September Froth Girl of the Month.

Blue Notes Provide Music

An "Autumn Picnic" atmosphere prevailed at the dance. Entrance to the dance floor was through an archway of pine trees. A floral arrangement spelling out "Harvest Ball" provided a backdrop for the bandstand. Featured at the far end of the hall was a picnic scene with evergreen trees in the background. A farm wagon trimmed with cornshocks and pumpkins stood in the center of the dance floor.

Music for the dance, sponsored annually by the Agriculture Student Council, was provided by Jim Erb and his Penn State Blue Notes. Refreshments of punch, sherbert, and cookies were served during the evening.

Coeducational Fun Nights Will Continue

Coeducational fun nights will be continued 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. tomorrow in Recreation Hall with members of the Physical Education Student Council taking charge of the night's activity.

Tomorrow night's program will be the third of the current semester.

Coeds are reminded not to wear heels if they are planning to attend the fun night. Games to be offered include ping-pong, volleyball, cards, badminton, and shuffleboard.

The programs are part of a long-range recreational development plan drawn up by Ernest B. McCoy, dean of the School of Physical Education and Athletics. Other plans call for student dancing after Saturday night athletic events in Rec Hall.

Farm Group Opens Vet School Drive

The campaign for establishment of a veterinary school at the College was reopened and pushed yesterday by the State Council of Farm Organizations, according to the Associated Press.

The establishment of such a school, the organization said, would be a "major step of service to the entire citizenry of the commonwealth and will require a substantial commitment of public funds."

The council is composed of over 30 state-wide organizations. It began its campaign for a vet school at the College last year.

In Exploratory Area

Wilmer E. Kenworthy, assistant to the president, when contacted yesterday said the administration was unaware of the renewal of the campaign for the establishment of a vet school at Penn State. Therefore, Kenworthy said, the administration was unprepared to make a statement.

Russell B. Dickerson, assistant dean of the School of Agriculture, said last night the campaign renewal was new to him also. He said, "The whole thing is still very much in the exploratory area, and I am not ready to make a statement."

The council said inaction would be a "fatal mistake." The installation of a complete veterinary college would cost 6 or 7 million dollars, J. Collins McSparran, secretary of the Pennsylvania State Grange, said. He emphasized that the establishment of a school at Penn State would not be detrimental to the University of Pennsylvania Veterinary College, presently subsidized by the state.

Opponents to the proposal have said the vet school at Penn could be expanded to double the number of graduates at a cost of less than a million dollars.

Vets Needed

McSparran said the purpose of the establishment of such a school is to produce more veterinarians for the state. About 75 doctors of veterinary medicine would be graduated annually from the proposed school. At present the University of Pennsylvania graduates 50 to 70 students a year.

The council statement mentioned needs for practicing veterinarians in rural areas, veterinarians in state service, such as meat inspection and disease control, and research specialists.

McSparran pointed out that establishment of the school would give support to agricultural programs, such as animal husbandry, which are closely associated with animal disease study.

"Economy is the spending of money wisely," he said. "Any epidemic such as foot and mouth disease would cost many millions more than the sum we are asking for the establishment of a new veterinary college."

The council's plan is now being studied by the Joint State Government Committee.

College Had No Knowledge of Probe

The College administration had no previous knowledge of the investigations of the Chesterman committee, according to various administrative officials.

The committee, named to make 30 studies of state governmental departments, declared recently that Penn State was an example of unnecessary expenditures which are harmful to the state's educational system. Head of the committee is Francis J. Chesterman.

President Milton S. Eisenhower made no statement on the matter and, according to spokesmen in his office, no comment is forthcoming.

The Chesterman committee especially struck out at the 10 million dollar cost of recent construction at the College by the General Authority. This money could be better used in big city colleges than in the remote Penn State, the committee claimed.

Walter H. Wiegand, director of the department of physical plant, said no one from the Chesterman committee had looked into the construction here as far as he knew.

The committee said the state should give more financial support to private colleges throughout the state rather than concentrate its grants at Penn State.

The committee said New York and New Jersey have successfully used this plan. The committee report, which was reported by the Associated Press Thursday, also hit the setup of the Department of Public Instruction and the use of state teachers' colleges.
