

'Barbara' --

play opens he is expected at their home.

When Undershaft meets Barbara's daughter, for both are dybar he is instantly attracted to namic persons with strong ideals. Their philosophies are miles apart, however, and thus they set about to convert each other.

It is Undershaft's belief that the greatest evil and worst of crimes is poverty. "Leave it to the poor to pretend that poverty is a blessing; leave it to the coward to make a religion of his cowardice by preaching humility," he says. Money and gunpowder are necessary to salvation, he maintains, for without those man can't afford honor, justice, and truth.

Barbara's religion, however, is one of pity and humility, and she lives it vehemently until she discovers that the Salvation Army's very existence is dependent on money from distillers and munition-makers—the very industries which are producing the evil the Army is trying to stamp out.

In the second act we find the shelter is in bad need of funds and will have to close if they are not forthcoming. Barbara refuses her father's offer of 100 pounds, however, because she wants him to give up manufacturing weapons and be "saved" rather than "buy" an easy conscience. But the Army, attaching more importance to the power his money will give to save many souls, accepts it. Barbara, desolate, takes off her uniform and loses her belief in a God of humility.

When, in the last act, Barbara and her family visit the munitions works at Perivale St. Andrews, they find it is a prosperous place where everyone is well-fed and clad. But the people are filled with oppression, vulgarity, and snobbery. Barbara decides to spend her life fighting this spirit and rejoices that she will never again know that her truths are listened to because she gives alms at the same time.

"I have got rid of the bribe of bread... Let God's work be done for its own sake," she says.

The second act, which takes place in the Salvation Army shelter, is certainly the best, for the first act is inclined to drag, and Barbara's very sudden unimpressive conversion makes for a weakness in the third.

The antics of Norman Alpert's Snobby Price, a loafer of tongue-in-cheek piety who claims to be "saved" for the price of a meal and says he no longer breaks windows because "the windows of heaven" are open to him, are tremendous; Adolphus Cusins, played by Myron Cole, certainly has the Shaw flavor.

The play has a wonderful warmth as a result of the acting of April Heinsohn, in the role of Major Barbara. She seems a very vital person at the same time as she maintains a certain dignity.

Andrew Undershaft, Shaw's spokesman, is excellently portrayed by Richard Andersen.

New York Art Museum To Show Frost's Sketch

"Newton's Room," a pen and ink sketch by Stuart H. Frost, son of Dr. Stuart W. Frost, professor of economic entomology, will be exhibited at the American Water Color Exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in New York.

The sketch is one of 500 paintings and drawings chosen from among 7000 submitted to regional juries. In his sketch Frost used an original method of lines and dots. The drawing is almost three feet wide.

$500 Oil Essay Contest Deadline Is Extended

The deadline of the $500 oil essay competition has been extended from Dec. 31 to March 31, 1953.

The contest, sponsored by the Association of Petroleum Refiners, Washington, D.C., is on the subject of "The Advantages of Re-Refined Oil." The deadline was extended to allow more time for thorough research on the part of undergraduate entrants.

Open Mind--

Commenting on the use of liquors, the dean of men said, "There is no reason why any man, from earth or otherwise, on this campus should need to imbibe the harmful and overly-potent concoctions created in the stills of Martian jungles. If they must use such liquids, we do not feel that it is our responsibility to accept them on this campus."

Dealing with the rule limiting women to the 36th floor, the dean would make no comment. Previous rules allowed women, except extraterrestials, up to the 37th floor.

COME TO CHURCH

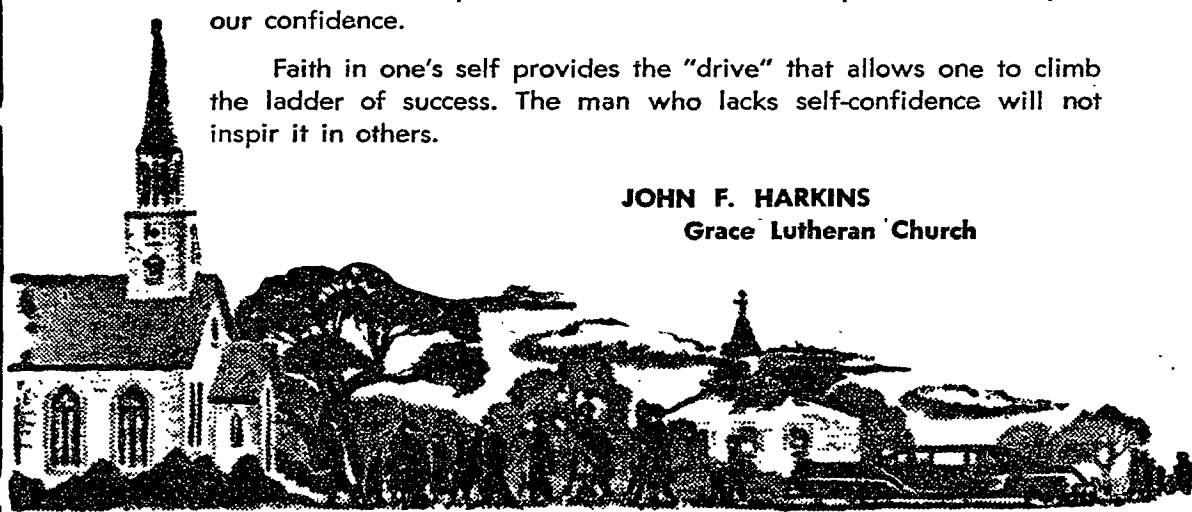

Faith is an essential in every successful life. Faith in God is a requisite to right living. Knowing God as our Creator and Benefactor buttresses man for the trials and temptations of life.

Faith in our fellowmen is necessary in our complex social and economic life. Every man is to be trusted until proven unworthy of our confidence.

Faith in one's self provides the "drive" that allows one to climb the ladder of success. The man who lacks self-confidence will not inspir it in others.
