Princeton Prof To Discuss Excavations

Dr. Homer A. Thompson, professor of classical archaeology at the Institute of Advanced Study, Princeton, N.J., will speak on "Excavating the Agora at Athens" at 8 p.m. Monday in 119 Osmond.

Since 1945, Dr. Thompson has been field director of excavations of the Agora, a project conducted by the American School of Classical Studies.

The school has conducted 17 excavation campaigns at the Agora, or "gathering place" of ancient Athens, since 1931. It is expected that this phase of the project will be completed within another year.

Dr. Thompson explains that work conducted from last February to July clarified the early history of the Agora, which was a six-acre open square. It served as the center of political, commercial, and social life for citizens of the Athenian city-state from early in the 6th century B.C. until it was sacked by northern barbarians in 267 A.D.

Dr. Thompson's lecture is sponsored by the division of fine and applied arts and the Departments of Classical Languages and Sociology.
