Measles Surge Called Higher Than Normal

The recent surge in the number of cases of three-day measles at the Infirmary is slightly higher than during other years at this time, Edgar S. Krug, assistant college physician, said yesterday.

Late yesterday afternoon, 23 patients, 11 of which were three-day measles cases, were confined to the Infirmary.

Krug said measles is one of the most contagious diseases. This could account for the increase in the number of cases, he said. He added that for all practical purposes, this type measles does not usually reoccur when the person has had them before.

Krug would not list the symptoms of the disease because he said other cases of sickness had similar symptoms and looked like the measles. However, according to a State College Physician, Dr. John K. Covey, watering nose and eyes and spots on the chest, back, or arms are usual symptoms of the German, three-day measles.

Covey said some cases of these measles have lasted for only a day. The three-day measles differ from regular measles in that regular measles can last up to two weeks, Covey said.

Vet School Bill Reaches House

A bill to appropriate $1 million for the construction of a school of veterinary medicine at the College was introduced last night in the House, the Associated Press has reported.

The measure, sponsored by Donald E. Whitentight (R.-Montour) and John J. Downey (D.-Schuylkill), would limit students to persons desiring to practice in rural areas of the state.

The Joint State Government Commission, fact-finding arm of the legislature, has reported that establishment of another veterinary school board would be impractical at this time because of a similar school at the University of Pennsylvania.
