Whispering Gallery

rived late, was rushed on stage with her instrument just in time to pick up her musical cue.

"I never knew he could dance so good, that old man," came out of the fog horn. She was, I think, referring to the cellist.

Miss Peters emerged from the wings, dazzling in glittering pink bouffant, at least 12 yards of it, which she hoisted like a 100 pound weight as she struggled on stage. It took her fully five minutes. She opened her mouth and sang an inspiring aria of Constanza from "The Abduction of the Seraglio," by Mozart, "Caro Nome" from Rigoletto, and an aria from "Don Pasquale." Between each number she lifted her skirts and exited only to reenter. It would have saved time if she had stood on a hand truck and had been wheeled in and out after every performance.

Rain never actually fell during the concert. A loud burst of thunder in the back of the auditorium turned out to be a human avalanche toppling down the banks of the Schuylkill.

My companion was besieged by a gregarious proprietor of a boarding house who sat next to her. The poor woman complained, "I had 21 shirts to laundry today, it's too much, and could I borrow your paper? I like to read the horoscope wishing well, and do you like this singer? I'd rather see a Burtron Holmes travelogue, and have a peppermint, dearie, and ain't it hot? and look at that neckline, why, she must be Evelyn $50,000 Treasure Chest West!"

During the applause for Miss Peters, Bernice lured a coffee vendor over by the steps and was trying to play Juliet to his Romeo. He dropped his coffee cups and made off like an Olympic sprinter. Then she discovered me. We didn't stay for the encore! Looking back, we saw the disillusioned vampire spitting curses at the boarding house proprietor, who quipped "Watch out, ya's stepping on me corns!"

The anointing of the British monarchs at coronation is believed to stem from the anointing of David and other Jewish leaders as recounted in the Old Testament.

Article Lists Openings In LA Field

"Twenty-one Jobs for the Liberal Arts Graduate," an article in the September issue of "Mademoiselle," lists jobs for the young woman who has completed her college career and is ready to begin her life's work with little or no experience.

This tabulation, reported by the magazine's jobs and future panel, gives detailed information on where to look for a job, what the employer expects of the applicant, what the employee can expect in return, and what future possibilities exist.

In general, most employers want ability in the applicant's chosen field, neatness in appearance and specialized training in the job applied for.

A language specialist can obtain work with the government in foreign language departments and agencies. Business students have a wide field in the commercial world, ranging from secretaries to personnel assistants. Other job opportunities include library assistants, the armed services, lab technicians, teachers and airline hostesses and agents.

For the student with a journalistic background there are many fields to explore. Newspapers, magazines, and industrial publications offer a wide variety of opportunities, such as cub reporter, continuity writer, editorial assistant and copy writer.

Salaries vary with the type of job and amount of specialization required, and the type of employment.

Ed Society Begins Fall Semester Work

One of the few professional organizations that students may join while still in college is the Association of Childhood Education International. Commonly known as the ACEI, the group provides memberships that students may retain through their coming teaching career.

Formally installed in 1946, the student chapter branched from the national organization, originated in 1930, through the merging of two groups, International Kindergarten Union and the National Council of Primary Education. Later, in 1946, the constitution was amended to include the intermediate level.

The first student chapter of ACEI at the College was made up of 62 members, most of them majors in elementary education. Now, however, ACEI is open not only to elementary ed majors, but to faculty members and child development majors as well.

"Mitten Tree" The book fair is only one of the organization's activities during the school year. At the fair, children's books are displayed and orders made out by parents and teachers are filled by the ACEI. Also sponsored by the group is the annual play brought in by the Children's World Fair for children in State College.

The "Mitten Tree," an annual activity of the group, features just what it says at Christmas time at a party for needy children, who are given the mittens that members of ACEI made to decorate the tree.

Meeting the first Wednesday of each month, the organization is kept busy with round-table discussions, guest speakers, and speeches from student teachers along with annual meetings with the children of State College.

Raise Standard Officers for the semester are elected in two's, one to replace the other during the required period of student teaching. Jeanette Johnston, president of the group, will be replaced by Frances Crawford during the spring semester. Mrs. Nora Graffius, assistant education professor, is the ACEI faculty sponsor.

Objectives of the student organization include working for the education and well-being of children, and raising a standard of preparation and encouraging continued professional growth of teachers and leaders in the field. ACEI aims to bring into active cooperation groups concerned with children in school, home and community.

Mademoiselle Holds College Board Contest

Mademoiselle's college board contest offers an opportunity to women undergraduates under 26 to test their talent in the fields of writing, fashion, advertising, art, promotion and merchandising. Winners will serve as guest editors of the magazine's 1954 college issue.

To enter the contest undergraduates should write a 1500 word criticism of Mademoiselle's August 1953 college issue and may include samples of their own work.

Entries must be typewritten and the name, class year, college and home address, major and minor fields of study, extra-curricular activities, and summer jobs given on two separate pages. This, together with criticisms, should be sent by Nov. 30 to College Editor, Mademoiselle, 575 Madison Avenue, New York 22, N.Y.

From the applicants 700 are chosen to be college board members on their own campus. During the year they complete three assignments which are graded on the basis of style and idea content.
