The Faculty and a Complete Education

President Milton S. Eisenhower, in his address to the faculty Monday, pointed up an important, yet often neglected, aspect of the educational process: the professor's obligation to educate the student does not end in the classroom.

President Eisenhower told the faculty, student conduct at the Penn game was evidence in some degree that the College was not meeting its educational responsibility. The President urged faculty and administrators to maximize efforts to help students develop sound traits of character and a deep understanding of moral values.

Too many professors—and students for that matter—think education begins and ends with the scheduled class hours. They fail to realize, or don't want to realize, that education is a continual process. And professors, perhaps more than anyone else, should feel a responsibility to see the process is continual.

Student behavior is always a reflection on the College and the values it instills in the student. Most people forget student behavior is largely determined by pre-college associations and not entirely by Penn State. It is during this pre-college training that moral values are determined. Therefore it is somewhat unfair to lay responsibility for all action on the College.

The faculty, however, can do much in four years to alter already learned moral values. Few students enter and leave college with the same ideas, ideals, and philosophy. It is therefore a heavy responsibility of the professor to achieve real education of the student, both in and out of the classroom.

The professor who does not face up to this responsibility is not a true educator. The history prof cannot limit education to history any more than the chemistry prof can limit education to chemistry. If they try to do so, the most important aspect of the educational process will be neglected: the formulation of a critical mind which can produce keen analysis, morally as well as academically.

College is the place for entire education. A half-way education is of no value. If there is opportunity for full education and the student does not avail himself of it, he has only himself to blame. If there is no opportunity for full education, the blame lies with those who withhold the opportunity.

Penn State is no different than any other college in this respect. Because Penn State is big does not mean the place for personal and full education is gone. Many, perhaps most, of the faculty realize this need for a real education. But there are some who ignore the need.

Some fault lies, of course, with the students. Many do not seek or want to learn moral standards. This, however, only serves to make the faculty responsibility to teach such standards more challenging. The teacher, to be worthy of the name, must not limit himself to functional knowledge. He must also instill a feeling of responsibility and consideration in the student.

Education, someone has said, is the leading of human souls to what is best, and making what is best out of them. If our colleges are to do this, education certainly cannot end in the classroom.

Annual Registration: A Political Safeguard

Students will register with the All-College elections committee between Oct. 26 and 30 for the campus political party with which they plan to affiliate. The State and Lion Parties will run candidates for freshman and sophomore class offices.

Although it is the first time such a registration plan has been tried, it appears to be a good thing. However, a discrepancy has already been found in the system: the Lion Party meeting Sunday night.

The Lion Party, long bearer of the dubious distinction of being the numerically smaller political party, had a crowd overflowing 121 Sparks, with members sitting in the aisles, others standing in the doorways, and still others unable to get in at all.

The first business taken up was the adoption of the party constitution, which had to be adopted before any business could be transacted. The constitution was unanimously agreed upon.

Many of those voting, however, will never be seen at another Lion Party meeting. Many will never be seen again at any political meeting. If someone had decided something was wrong with the constitution and an amendment was necessary, the Lion Party might have been crippled through outside influence which would set-up the constitution for the party. The party would, moreover, have no recourse, since everyone attending the meeting was a bonafide member of the party.

While speaking directly about Sunday night's meeting, this does not imply the same thing cannot happen to any party, any time.

Because of this, the clique registration should be made on a year-round basis, set-up similarly to the Pennsylvania registration system. Students could register, change party, or drop their clique affiliation anytime until a deadline immediately before clique meetings. Freshmen would be given a chance to register between an explanatory meeting and the first clique meeting.

The campus politics workshop at the Student Encampment, which originated the idea of the registration, considered only having one meeting of the clique before the election. In reports to the encampment plenary session and since then, as the idea has been integrated into the fall semester election code, no mention was made of the organizational clique meetings. Theoretically, everything in the clique should operate smoothly throughout the year without the necessity to reorganize the cliques. However, the Lion Party found this to be impossible this year. It could easily happen again. Registration should, therefore, cover all clique meetings.

Little Man on Campus

By Bibler

"Hello, Records' office? Miss Slauson has just withdrawn from Cooking 281!"

Short 'Change

By GUS VOLLMER

"Little Blue Riding Hood" and "St. George and the Dragon Net" have definitely taken hold of the campus by now, and here's a little addition I found in the Pacific Weekly. This story appeared under the headline "Snag Net."

5:57, I was on my way over to a fraternity house for dinner. I had been given an invitation for the evening by Tau Crow, acknowledged tops so far as fraternities go. I walked up the steps and rang the bell. A pledge let me in.

6:01, A tall, well-dressed student came over and laid his hand on my knee affectionately. "I'm Alabaster Partytime, president of this here frat," he said. "We were all sure glad you could come, and we'll do our best to show you a good time." He went on, "Right now, our members are preparing to serenade you with our theme song." He was right, for off in the distance I could hear the plaintive chant of happy actives and tortured pledges:

"Hubba, hubba, Goodrich rubba."

7:09, After a delicious dinner of stewed rice and gruel, I timidly ventured a few questions about the financial end of the fraternity. "Well," a member said, "we got just about the lowest rates on campus, just $264.87 a month. Of course," he went on, "meals are a little extra." Right then and there I was sold, but the member then decided to ask me a few questions. When I told him I had a 0.3 average he was overjoyed. "That's wonderful," he said, "for a moment I was afraid maybe you were one of those who studied." He paused and then went on sadly, "We hate to have anybody that's too smart for their own britches in our frat. Those intellectuals who can read will be the death of us yet."

10:34, I was bid! I'm now a member of Tau Crow. I was so happy I rushed immediately over to Sigh Thigh to tell my girl, Phallusia Crunk, the good news. "Why Algy," she said, "that's the most I'm so happy for you." "Phallusia," I said, "Now that I'm a bonafide member of campus society, I want me and you to go steady." I pinched her and she slapped me happily.

(Note: Does this sound familiar? All apologies to Max Schulman's "Bare Foot Boy With Cheek.")

Here are some excerpts from a column entitled "Mr. Peevs' Journal" in the College Eye of the Iowa State Teachers' College.

Thursday, September 37. Some of our professors held a punch party, but I didn't get invited. I wasn't so disappointed when I learned—from an unimpeachable source—that there wasn't anything in the punch.

They are building funny little cement things all around the campus. They look like hitching posts, but they are probably for statues of great educators—like Socrates and John Dewey.

Friday, September 38. They are starting to fix the steps in the auditorium again. I found out what the hitching posts are for: GARBAGE CANS. And the chains are to keep them from being tipped over, I hope.

Just offhand, I don't know anyone who'd want to steal a garbage can. But they have the cutest little motto on them: "Keep our Campus Clean."

Monday, September 41. Music recital in the auditorium tonight. I didn't go in but it sounded good from the hall.

Tuesday, September 42. I was mortified to find that it wasn't a music recital I heard from the hall last night. Just a bunch of people hollering at play rehearsal. I'd swear I heard a soprano. Our campus should be kept clean. Thought for the week: KEEP IT CLEAN.

Some students in a political science class at Temple University got their feathers ruffled recently. During a lecture on court cases, the professor commented that he has a parakeet at home to which he has taught 25 court cases and all he has to do is to say "Marbury vs. Madison" and the bird repeats the details of the case. If a bird can do it, why can't students? Maybe that's for the birds.

LA Council Seats Open to Freshmen

Liberal Arts freshmen interested in petitioning for seats on the Liberal Arts School Council may pick up blanks Monday and Tuesday in the LA office, 133 Sparks.

Four freshmen will be elected to the council. Elections will be held Oct. 26 and 27. Norma Vollmer, election committee chairman, announced that petitions must be returned to the LA office by 5 p.m. Tuesday. At least 25 signatures of LA freshmen must appear on each petition.

3 Ed Students Named To Graduate Council

Three representatives of the graduate students in education have been elected to the Graduate Student Council.

Dolores Bannorman was elected for a two-year term, and Nicholas Troisi and William Ricker for one year terms.
