

Sport SPOTLIGHT

No matter what is done to promote it, cross-country seems destined to remain in the dim background as far as intercollegiate athletics are concerned.

It's a shame that the sport doesn't receive the recognition and popularity that it deserves. It may not have the color or action so prominently displayed in sports like football, basketball, or baseball, but here is a sport that not only offers a terrific display of stamina, but requires perfection in training and strategy for the winning runners.

The sport was originated as a conditioning program for track men, but slowly developed into a full-fledged intercollegiate sport. It has become the key-note in distance running.

It takes strong legs, a stout chest, and fast thinking to make a distance runner good. The five-mile course requires constant practice and conditioning. But the secret to success doesn't lie entirely in physical ability. A good runner knows his opponents' weak points. Taking advantage of this kind of knowledge, a runner can strengthen his chances 100 per cent.

So this game of grueling, driving, overland racing isn't as simple as it may appear on the surface. Like the successful quarterback, the successful runner must be thinking all the time.

Under head track coach Chick Werner, cross-country has been extremely successful at Penn State. Werner, one of the most renowned coaches in the business, has guided the Nittany hill-and-dale destinies for 21 years. With one official meet victory recorded against Cornell, and a group of outstanding runners on his squad, there are reasons to believe that the Lions will once again be included among the nation's best—a spot they've become accustomed to in past seasons.

Although the game is popular at the Vale, it still doesn't attract the spectators it deserves. Of course, the big reason here lies in the fact that the fan is unable to watch the entire race. He can watch the group start. He sees them pass the half-way mark. And he sees the finish, which is, of course, the most important part of the race.

But he misses the over-all pattern which develops during the race—when favorites make their bids for the lead, when early leaders begin to fade, and slowly sift back into the pack. These are the developments which make the race what it is.

It's like the spectator at the baseball game who leaves his seat for a moment and who doesn't
