Evaluation--

The cooperative evaluation arrangement was created because many professional accrediting groups, each concerned with one field, tend to tear apart the school rather than unite it, he indicated.

The association will submit questionnaires to the College next year as the basis for preparing for the evaluation team visit, Jones said.

COME TO CHURCH

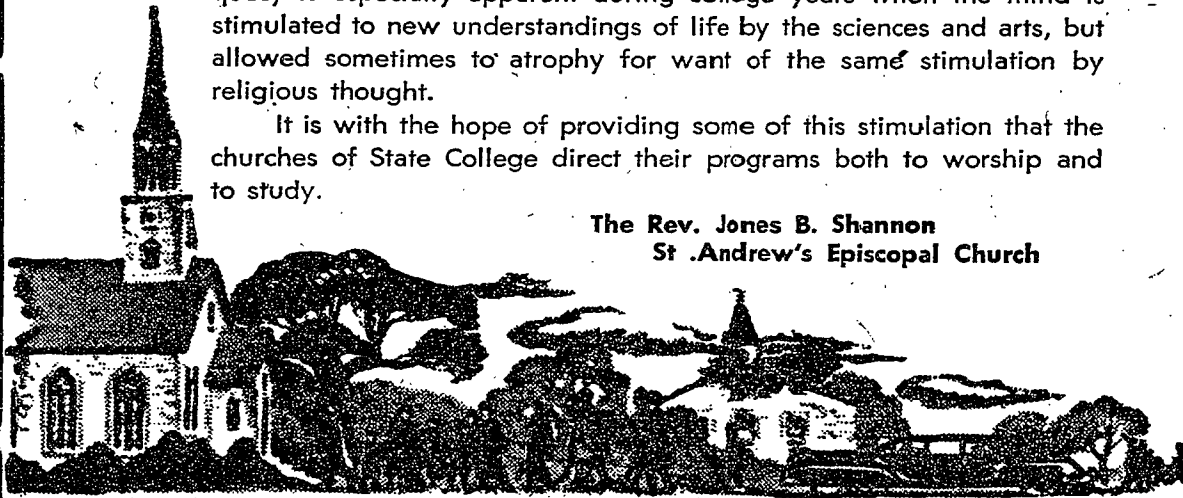

While we are in college, there are two alternatives in respect to our religious development.

On the one hand, we may settle for the relatively shallow understanding which we inherit from childhood. On the other hand, we may admit the possibility of a deeper understanding and seek it, coming to a more mature and intellectually responsible Christian faith.

It is inevitable that the ideas of religion which we had at the age of ten or fifteen will be inadequate for adulthood. This inadequacy is especially apparent during college years when the mind is stimulated to new understandings of life by the sciences and arts, but allowed sometimes to atrophy for want of the same stimulation by religious thought.

It is with the hope of providing some of this stimulation that the churches of State College direct their programs both to worship and to study.
